On the table was spread a fine, snow-coloured, silky tablecloth, patterned with an array of designs. It complimented the vibrancy of the napkins, which were painted with different themes of Rosh Hashanah: flowers and pomegranates framed the pictures of a shofar being blown in shul, a group of men doing Tashlich, and a family having their festive meal. The napkins were put at the right side of each plate, and on them were placed exclusive silver cutlery shining magnificently under the brilliance of the crystal chandelier. In addition to the water glasses, there were also tall Venetian Murano glasses for the Italian Chianti wine. These Venetian glasses were richly decorated with vivid leaves of every colour, giving the table an ostentatious sparkle, as well as a floral springtime liveliness.

We were very hungry and our stomachs showed their lack of patience by grumbling, so once everyone was seated my father began the meal with Kiddush. We then proceeded into the kitchen to wash our hands for the blessing of Hamotzi. There, our eyes wandered to the two lovely platters on which numerous pieces of vazistolma were neatly arranged, looking very impressive. Vazistolma is the Georgian name for vine leaves stuffed with spiced ground beef and rice. It is delicious with my grandmother's tzo – a spicy, sour sauce made of green plums, which is used like ketchup in the Georgian cuisine. But my little brother seemed to be looking in the direction of the enormous pot of potatoes, roasted to perfection, beautifully browned, and waiting to be eaten with chakhokhbili – spiced chicken cooked in tomato sauce. The kitchen that night was like a casino – drawing you in, and making you want to stay. Despite that, everyone eventually returned to the table where my father recited the blessing of Hamotzi on the large, round, majestic challah, proudly baked by my grandmother and still warm from the oven. Twenty-five impatient faces were watching my father tackle the challah with the knife as fast as he possibly could.

The dominating smells from the kichen made my mouth water. I began to taste the penetrating flavours of the khalia – a Georgian beef stew that marinates overnight in various seasonings, such as chopped onions and garlic, coriander, basil, oregano, black pepper, red chilli pepper, salt, tomato paste, and sour plums to deeply absorb the spicy flavours that characterize the dish. Khalia is served with ghomi – cornflower that has a sunny, golden shine when it is cooked in water. But while our noses feasted on the Georgian cuisine, we still had to restrain our appetites as we went through the customary tradition before the feast.

There are certain symbolic foods that we are accustomed to eat on the first night of Rosh Hashanah. For instance, the pomegranate implies that our merits should multiply like its seeds, and dates are eaten for their literal meaning – to go out on dates! The leeks as well as the beets symbolize the destruction of our enemies. As I passed the beets across the table, my cousin made a certain face that distinctly said, "I don't like beets!"

Next, there was the head of fish, which signifies that we should be like heads and not tails – the fish that was served was a pike caught by my brother in the French River, and stuffed with a secret recipe of my grandmother's. The apple and honey represented a sweet new year. The apple with honey was without a doubt the tastiest of all the signs. However, as delicious as it was, eating it on an empty stomach, while the captivating aromas tickled the appetite, felt like eating a stale cheese sandwich on dry old bread.

The meal was at last served, and we were finally able to satisfy our burning desires. The atmosphere in the room felt very warm and friendly, but under the deafening noises of the numerous guests, it was definitely not a relaxing atmosphere. Everyone at the table got lost in jolly conversation as we enjoyed each other's company while we ate. The discussions ranged from the wars in the Middle East to the university programs available at Ryerson.

My five-year-old cousin constantly entertained the company by providing background music like Dip the Apple in the Honey. My grandmother had no shortage of toasts, nor did my father have any shortage of old Soviet jokes. Looking at the adults, anyone could tell how immersed they were in their business chat.

At this point, my older brother blurted out, "Can this table get any more boring than it is?!" And off he went, only to return juggling five balls. The spirit of this table was something to be admired. But my mother's Georgian cuisine was definitely the highlight of the evening. ■

Sanctity of time

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

JONAH SIMCHA CHAIM MUSKAT BROWN

Jonah Simcha Chaim Muskat Brown

The concept of time in Judaism is connected with holiness. In the first instance, the narrative of Genesis, God sanctifies time – He blesses the seventh day, the Sabbath, as an everlasting sanctuary of holiness within time. Many years later, as the Jewish nation prepares to leave Egypt, it is called on by God to initiate time – to sanctify the first moon, thereby blessing each forthcoming month and creating holiness transcendent of time. God creates linear time but offers the Jew the opportunity to take initiation and use his time in a holy manner.

Ecclesiastes best defines linear time as abiding with the order of nature. "A generation goes and a generation comes, but the earth endures forever" (Eccles. 1:4-5); it is a continuum in which "there is nothing new under the sun."

As nature runs its course, God invites the Jew to take a few moments from his day or some time from his busy week to connect with Him in a realm of holiness – whether through prayer, celebration of the Sabbath, or some other prescribed ritual.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel writes in 1963, "Six days a week we live under the tyranny of things in space; on the Sabbath we try to become attuned to holiness in time."

Godliness can only be experienced as a result of preparation, Rabbi Heschel writes, by saying, "Farewell to manual work and learn[ing] to understand that the world has already been created and will survive without the help of man."

The sanctification of the moon and the subsequent establishment of the Jewish calendar, by contrast, allow the Jew to reach even higher. Preparing to conclude more than two centuries of slavery – in which Egyptian society sets out to conquer time by building everlasting monuments of space – God teaches the Jewish nation that time does not have to be limited, that reality does not have remain stagnant in set motion.

> On the Sabbath, Jews refrain from physical acts and focus on their essence.

God invites the Jew to now be the one to bless time, as if to emphasize that a finite being can take control of his life: constantly growing, just as the moon never remains the same each night. On the Sabbath, God beckons the Jew into a private, intimate relationship with Him. On a monthly basis, and throughout the Jewish festival cycle, however, Jews invite God to dwell amongst them.

Both concepts of time are sacred. The former is constant, while the latter can be spontaneous and voluntary – because in life, individuals need structure and rules, but also opportunities to experience sanctity outside of prescribed everyday occurrences.

On the Sabbath, Jews refrain from physical acts and focus on their essence – their soul, which is metaphysical – because that is the essence of the day. Festivals, however, are called mo'adim, appointed times, because they are times when the Jew decides to invest his soul, his essences, into the days themselves, transforming mundane existence into sacred reality. Whereas on the Sabbath, a Jew becomes a vessel for a Sabbath reality, festivals transform ordinary weekdays into vessels for a new reality – that of sanctity.

Time is a blessing. It is an existence, unlike space, that cannot be altered. Time is a fact of life in which we know nothing of its origins, only that it is in constant motion, always progressing forward like a train with no emergency brake. No human can stop time, but can only choose how to articulate it. Time becomes sacred when utilized for purpose and towards meaning. Life can get busy – very busy at times – and it is through the Sabbath, through prayer, and through other means of detachment from physicality that we come to refocus and remind ourselves why we are acting and why we are living.

By contrast, we sometimes find ourselves with too much time, and with confusion about how to fill that time with meaningful pursuits to the extent that we begin making it, "subservient to space." We forget that space and time are separate entities and begin filling our time with space, by using physical, mundane matter to occupy our time.

But "we can only master time with time. The higher goal of spiritual living is not to amass a wealth of information, but to face sacred moments."

The festivals remind us that holiness is a mo'ed – an appointed time designated by a finite being. The sanctity of time is to be found, not in days like the Sabbath, which are blessings in their own right, but rather in mundane moments that human beings decide to elevate and use for holy expression.

Unlike Adam the First in Joseph Soloveitchik's Lonely Man of Faith, we cannot use nature to conquer time, but rather we must transcend scientific advancements and use time to experience holiness beyond time. Perhaps the challenge that so many experience is that they relied on others, on external realities, to provide a connection to holiness. What they fail to understand is that holiness is internal, that it must be created and sought out for. The Sabbath teaches us that holiness exists within the natural world; the festivals come to teach us that it is up to each individual to seek out sanctity. ■

The saga of the eastern European eshet chayil

JESSICA POLLOCK

Prior to Hitler's chancellery, approximately nine million Jews were living in the European countries that were subsequently occupied during the course of the war. An abundance of Jews were concentrated in eastern Europe in small villages otherwise known as shtetls.

Compared to thriving urban centres such as Budapest and Warsaw, Jewish shtetls were rather backward. In these remote villages, Jews were able to preserve their cultural and religious traditions and speak Yiddish as their native tongue.

On the Jewish Sabbath, Jews around the world routinely sing Eshet Chayil to the mothers of the family – a psalm from the Book of Proverbs. Eshet Chayil, which translates to a woman of valour, is the archetype of an ideal Jewish mother who is God-fearing, compassionate, tends to the home and is devoted to her husband and children. This portrayal succinctly describes Jewish mothers as the pillars of their communities in pre-Holocaust eastern Europe.

Notwithstanding women's traditional exclusion from the workforce in order to focus on their unpaid domestic tasks, Jewish men in eastern Europe gradually called upon their wives to assist them in earning enough money to sustain the family. In fact, during the 1930s, approximately one-third of Jewish women in Poland were employed outside their homes, constituting 20 per cent of the Jewish labour force.

By virtue of the economic decline following World War I, Jewish women progressively expanded their pious Eshet Chayil representation to include their utility as "seamstresses, storekeepers, peddlers, or even sellers of whiskey [to] keep food on their families' tables." As a result, the skills Jewish women fostered in the east were beneficial during the outset of the Holocaust.

As Hitler's threatening policies became realistic, many Jewish families in eastern Europe recognized the need to devise strategies to protect themselves from the pervasive Third Reich. For those eastern European Jewish women who did not emigrate in time, their fears were brought to fruition when Nazis began displacing them and their families from their homes and shtetls.

As early as October 1939, Jewish mothers were initially forced with their families to relocate to ghettos – city districts exclusively designed to concentrate Jewish people under miserable living conditions.

When being deported to ghettos, Dalia Ofer outlines "a phenomenon of 'uprootedness' that was [spawned once women] lost all they had and became refugees in their own city." This transition was one of the first events that jeopardized their ability to fulfil their role as Nashei Chayil – women of valour. Nevertheless, modes of resistance were frequent in ghettos across eastern Europe. Women who participated in organized resistance movements were typically couriers who "encouraged, organized, searched for safe sites, distributed newspapers… set up partisan bases, developed programs and obtained guns." Accordingly, many women participated in the momentous Warsaw Ghetto uprising of 1943.

During these times, Jewish mothers' identities were largely forged around their will to continue parenting. They ventured to maintain a semblance of normalcy for their children by providing them fundamental necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, cleanliness and a sense of Jewishness or Yiddishkeit. However, assuring that their families had the bare essentials became an increasingly daunting task as deportations to concentration camps accelerated.

As rumours spread around eastern Europe of the dreadful conditions in concentration camps, many mothers voluntarily sent their children to hide in non-Jewish homes, convents or with partisans in forests. In one case, a Jewish mother ordered for deportation with her four-year old son, shoved the young boy to his older brother who was bound for a "safer" camp, Buchenwald. Her young son, Yisrael Meir Lau, would later become the chief rabbi of Israel. In the direst of circumstances, Jewish mothers attempted to protect their children to the ultimate end, even if it jeopardized their own psychological well-being.

Nevertheless, Jewish women, many of whom were mothers, were susceptible to forms of torture that their male counterparts were not as frequently subjected to. Despite Rassenchande – race policy laws that forbade Nazis from engaging in sexual acts with Jewish women – many Nazi officials working in the camps regularly sexually assaulted female Jewish inmates. Upon entry into many camps around eastern Europe, Nazi soldiers would force women to strip naked in front of groups of men for extended periods of time, thus violating customs of Jewish modesty, and actively humiliating them in front of strangers. Women were forced to accept rape – oftentimes in public – in order to receive more food, privileges or save their children or family members from death. In Mauthausen, Auschwitz and Dachau, for instance, organized brothels were established whereby Jewish women were sexually enslaved. As a result, Jewish women who endured sexual violence in the ghettos and camps were ashamed and stigmatized after the Holocaust.

> Jewish women, many of whom were mothers, were susceptible to forms of torture that their males counterparts were not.

In concentration camps such as Ravensbruck and Auschwitz, pregnancies were forbidden. Since "women's sexuality and reproductive capabilities were integral to the Nazis' racist agenda to create and maintain an 'Aryan Race,'" pregnant Jews were generally sent to their death upon entry into concentration camps. Some pregnant women were exempt from death only to become subjects of Nazi medical experiments, undergoing internal mutilation, forced sterilizations and abortions. Jewish women were aware of these risks and many expectant inmates tried to conceal their pregnancies. Some Jewish women who did give birth while incarcerated in camps were impelled to kill their newborn within minutes to resist handing over their baby to the SS. It was circumstances and decisions like these that nearly destroyed the spirits of persecuted Nashei Chayil.

It should now be evident that Nazis consistently and unrelentingly attempted to diminish female inmates' identities as Jewish women and mothers by inhibiting their ability to fulfil their roles as Nashei Chayil. This essay elaborated upon practices and methods eastern European Jewish women employed to preserve their pre-Holocaust maternal spirit and epitomize true women of valour in the face of their Nazi oppressors. ■

YARDENA KATZ

We move like the mice. We scurry, we zigzag, we wander across the square, bumping into one another in our quest to nowhere. The plaza teems with panic and relief and desperation all at once. Men and women and children run in all directions, eastwards and backwards and into each other's reedy arms.

We all don the same stripes and have bare scalps. Our clothes smell of the flesh of the dead, though the dead and the living are the same here. The striped uniform rubs against your gentle skin, at first chafing it; but it quickly becomes a cherished garment, one that fends off cold and lets you bury your soul beneath it.

We see the trucks make their slow approach, and some of us tremble in anticipation. But I do not tremble. I feel no breath of liberation. No relief rolls through the iron gates of the camp and into my heart. My journey has numbed me to such sentiments. I see the soldiers, the "freedom bearers," and I know that no freedom is truly on my horizon. For, what lies beyond the fences? My universe has been tainted grey. The contortions of metal, with their electric contraptions and vines of jagged spikes, separate me from nothing.

I have been robbed of my brothers, my comrades and kin. The loneliness eats at the vestiges of my soul. No liberation can twine us back together.

We part like a sea for these trucks, these bearers of nothing. They champion through the vast square, toting soldiers who wave banners and flags. How little these fools know of redemption. Some of us charge towards them; some of us stare in empty indifference. They gape. Chocolates and breads and other fine things are distributed, but I crave no physical pleasures.

So I run. I muster the remnants of my will and I break from the masses. I desert the flock of baldheads, the cacophonous waves of skeletons who claw and charge towards the chariots of metal. I run barefoot across the numbing blanket of snow and fantasize crawling beneath it.

Days pass. Weeks pass.

I am placed on the Soviets' list of supposed survivors. I am sent to a camp for displaced persons. Its inhabitants are empty, as am I. I linger there for months.

I get sent to the port city of Marseilles. I wait for the boat for weeks on end. My life is a series of ticks on a watch. I board the SS Marseilles.

I roll, tremble, vomit, cower amidst the staggering waves like all the pathetic refugees. I befriend no one; I keep to myself. I arrive on Ellis Island.

I am met by the Jewish refugee organization. They hand me a spare pair of clothes and some pocket money. I feel like a thief.

I settle in a grimy one-bedroom apartment. It is shared with four other German refugees. I listen to them chant foreign Yiddish verses on the Sabbath.

I find work in a deli store in the Lower East Side.

I keep to myself. I speak little. Nobody knows me. Months pass. Years pass.

It is a chilly evening in January when the knock resounds from the door. I am signing bills, counting boxes, organizing shipments. I am sitting on a stool behind the counter of meat and sauerkraut. I shuffle towards the entrance. A man enters, sweeping in a terrible gust of cold.

"Ah, thank you. You are open now, yes?"

Though the hour is late, I nod. I lead him towards the musty counter. He removes his woolen hat and undrapes his thick scarf. In the dim light of the shop, his face comes into view and it is familiar. It chafes at my memory, but I cannot place his face. The man deliberates between pastrami and smoked meat.

"How much for a pound?" His accent is German. So familiar. A flicker of hope suddenly ignites itself, threatens to turn the ash in my heart into gorgeous flame. Could it be – a reunion of brothers, in a deli store miles from home? He looks up. Our eyes meet. I must ask him his name. But he opens his mouth first.

"You look so… so familiar… Where have we met before?"

He looks deeply into my face. My stiffened features relax. He is my kind. I speak:

"Is that you, my brother? From Auschwitz?"

At the utterance of "Auschwitz," his eyes refocus and lock on mine. He stares.

And then his face collapses in a painful contortion; his features warp into a mien of terror. He recoils and wails. And I immediately know I am right. We had met at Auschwitz. But he was no brother of mine.

I ravished his belongings, his children, his dignity. And then, I stole his story. In fear of "liberation" – I dressed like him, I burrowed like him, I scurried like him.

He is a dirty Jew. And I am a Nazi. ■

Oberlander fights for citizenship, and an El Al passenger gives film two fists down

Death squad member wins reprieve

Ottawa will review the case of Nazi-era war-crimes suspect Helmut Oberlander, 92, who's been fighting to retain his citizenship since 1995. The Federal Court of Appeal sent the case back to the federal cabinet after it filed its third motion since 2001 to revoke his citizenship. The government alleges the Ukraine-born Oberlander failed to disclose his wartime service in a death squad that killed 23,000 people when he became a Canadian in 1960. In 2000, a judge agreed, and the cabinet revoked his citizenship three times. Twice it was restored by court rulings. The third revocation is being reviewed. Oberlander, of Waterloo, Ont., claims he was a low-level interpreter and would have been shot if he tried to escape.

British actor Jude Law read aloud a German-Jewish author's Holocaust-era letter at a Feb. 21 event to promote awareness of the challenges facing refugees in Europe. He read Lion Feuchtwanger's 1935 open letter to the Nazis occupying his Berlin home. Law, along with other British celebrities, was taking part in a live performance for 200 migrants at a 4,000-person refugee camp in Calais, France, that featured readings of letters about the plight of the refugees. Feuchtwanger, a prominent writer, was a vocal critic of the Nazis before they came to power in 1933. He moved to France after Hitler's election, and was jailed after the Nazi invasion. After escaping, he was granted asylum in the United States, where he died in 1958. ■

Like other university graduates, I get many emails asking for donations. A few weeks ago, I was beginning to think it was about time to give something, but put everything on hold when I learned that the students at McMaster University had voted in one of those ill-informed boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaigns that have been sweeping university campuses. I was even more upset when I read that the president did little more than suggest to the press that the students' union did not represent the university. Is he really unaware that students are the raison d'être for a university?

Not only do I consider a McMaster BDS campaign to be an insult to the credibility of the university, I consider it to be an attack upon my heritage and upon me personally.

Although I consider it chutzpah to want to boycott me and ask for my money at the same time, I did decide to go ahead with a donation, but instead of sending it to the university, I sent it to McMaster Hillel. Until some semblance of sanity returns to academia, I would encourage other Jewish university alumni to do as I did.

Marvin Silbert
Toronto

I am extremely disappointed in NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair's decision to vote against condemning the BDS movement. Doing so and encouraging the caucus to do so is an affront to Canadian values ("Anti-BDS motion supported by Liberal, Tory MPs," Feb. 25).

Mulcair is smart enough to know who the foreign funders of BDS are and about their desire to undermine Canadian values and laws. He should be smart enough to know what fate holds if this anti-democratic, anti-tolerance and anti-human rights movement grows anywhere in Canada or elsewhere.

David Nitkin
Toronto

For the third time in less than a year and a half, a BDS motion was presented at McGill University. However, this time students voted to pass the resolution (cjnews.com).

As students at McGill, we will not take this minor setback as a loss, but as a time to unite against discrimination.

We call on all McGill students and the wider community to voice their concerns and push for a campus-wide referendum. While we respect the decision made at the Students' Society of McGill University, of the 39,000-plus students who attend this institution, only 883 voted, representing a total of 2.2 per cent of the overall student body. In the middle of midterms, this is far too large of a decision to be made by so few students. The brothers of Alpha Epsilon Pi at McGill condemn such a divisive and anti-democratic vote.

In support of Nini

We, a group of Israeli-Canadians, urge the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver to honour the invitation to Achinoam Nini to perform in Vancouver for Yom Ha'atzmaut, despite pressure from JNF and a few, but loud, protesters from the community ("JNF Canada pulls event support over Noa performance," Feb. 25).

Nini is a remarkable artist with an exceptional musical career. However, we suspect that the resistance to inviting her may not be her musical achievements, but rather her personal views on peace and human rights.

The fact that she is known in Israel for her progressive humanistic views and has been attacked as an "Israel hater" is not relevant to the decision whether to invite her to perform. Such views that value all human beings should not be considered extreme. Unfortunately, the current political climate in Israel condemns every person who advocates for peace and human rights, and campaigns, such as the recent one by Im Tirzu, and other similar extremist groups, single out progressive artists.

By cancelling the invitation, we will not only be missing the opportunity to experience a great musician, it will also mean taking a stand against everything Vancouver and Canada is proudly known for – our belief in tolerance, pluralism and human rights, the same values that are reflected in our Jewish heritage.

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Two rabbis walk into a synagogue...

There's a misconception that Jewish scholars who use humour are seeking to entertain rather than educate, but it's a tradition that dates back to talmudic times

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: The inclusion of jokes in our previous column ("You know what happens when a 'yekke' marries a chassid? You have a wedding that starts exactly two hours late") is something I have been thinking about lately.

I was teaching a class on midrash recently and I found myself comparing the use of mashal (parables) in midrash to how rabbis will often use humour in their sermons. It is a trope, a common feature of the genre that people now understand and appreciate as a method of connecting the material to the listener.

I suppose that bringing up this topic is quite appropriate for Adar, and so I was wondering, do you use humour in sermons? In everyday life? To what purpose?

I find myself trying to be funny in my classes, partly because I think it is central to my persona and partly because I recognize the performative aspect of teaching. So in the hope of creating a new way of thinking about rabbinic humour I ask, brother, can you paradigm?

Rabbi Scheim: Funny you should ask. I am in the process of teaching a course on Jewish humour from rabbinic times to the present, focusing on humour as a survival tool, and as a means of making sense of an increasingly crazy and troubled world.

Many recent books have brought new light to this subject, especially Ruth Wisse's No Joke: Making Jewish Humor. This being the 100th yahrzeit year of Sholem Aleichem, I have used the opportunity to examine his writings and deepen my appreciation of his role in setting the stage (literally and figuratively) for today's Jewish comics. I do attempt, where appropriate, to use humour as a tool in sermons and teaching, but try to avoid the formulaic "opening joke" preferred by many rabbis, which can lead to the joke, more than the sermon itself, being remembered.

Many of my teachers in my seminary years hailed from the old world and were funny, though not always intentionally. Their unique sense of English syntax didn't always correspond to their impeccable grasp of talmudic text, which allowed for memorable classroom experiences, something today's students sadly are far less likely to experience. I frequently share stories about my teachers, because both their profound learning and their humour taught me a great deal about the nature of Jewish survival.

Rabbi Finegold: There seems to be a misconception that rabbis who use humour are seeking to entertain rather than educate, and that they see their role as that of a showman, someone who is irreverent, quite literally. But we have a long history of scholars and rabbis employing humour going all the way back to the Talmud. Rabbis were quite cutting in pointing out the shortcomings of their colleague's arguments, and sometimes even the colleagues themselves.

My favourite commentator, the medieval Rabbi Avraham Ibn Ezra, never misses an opportunity to take a jab at the other commentators, sometimes gratuitously. There is value in humour and wit in and of itself though, even beyond the classic joke during a sermon.

The Vilna Gaon points out that the name of our most solemn day – Yom Kippur – contains a play on words. Yom Hakippurim (its name in the Bible) is akin to Yom Ke'Purim, a day that is like Purim. He sees the day with the most levity as potentially greater than a day filled with prayer and repentance. Wit and joy are greater tools than fasting and chest beating when it comes to achieving closeness with God.

Rabbi Scheim: The vast Jewish over-representation in modern comedy seems to reflect a DNA-level Jewish instinct to find humour in even the darkest of circumstances.

We have used humour to mock our adversaries, to find laughter in our day-to-day struggles in times of poverty and persecution, and to find perspective in an ever-challenging and dangerous world. Humour has taught us humility in casting light on our foibles, idiosyncrasies, and quirks that can drive even those who love us to distraction.

Using humour appropriately and effectively offers a rabbi the opportunity to lift spirits in the context of meaningful Torah learning. Indeed laughter amid life's challenges may be one of our secrets to survival. ■

Conversion can raise acceptance issues for children

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

It's rare that babies born to Jewish mothers are available for adoption, since Jewish families are inclined to take care of their own orphans and reluctant to sever parental rights.

When Jewish families choose to adopt, therefore, the process almost always ends with a conversion for their adopted child.

But according to Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue spiritual leader Rabbi Jarrod Grover, recognition of conversions for adopted children remains an issue in the Jewish community, just as it is for adults.

He explained that unless the conversion is done by an Orthodox beit din, a child's conversion, at birth or years later, could be challenged or deemed invalid if they choose to be bar or bat mitzvahed or married in an Orthodox ceremony.

"When you convert, you get a document, and the document outlines when the conversion happened. It has the names of the beit din – the panel of rabbis that supervise the conversion – and the document is only as valid… as the credibility of the rabbis on the panel," Rabbi Grover said.

In Toronto, the Vaad Harabonim is the only body that can perform Orthodox conversions, and it rules that Conservative and Reform rabbis are unqualified to serve on a beit din for conversion, which "remains a major challenge in the Jewish community."

As a result, if a family chooses a Conservative or Reform conversion, there are complications that could arise should a child choose to marry into an Orthodox family or move to Israel.

"In my years as a rabbi in Toronto," Rabbi Grover said, "I have encountered dozens of cases of people coming to me saying, 'I was adopted… I always thought I was Jewish, I never had an issue. Suddenly [an Orthodox rabbi] asks for my papers and they tell me – surprise, the rabbi who converted you did not meet our standards.'"

Although it may seem that the best way to avoid any issues is to convert with the Orthodox beit din, many non-Orthodox couples are turned away by the Vaad Harabonim because of their level of observance.

"It's not easy, because the standard for Orthodox rabbis in Toronto is, I think, extremely stringent, and I respect them for that. But because of those stringencies, they make it basically impossible for many families who would like to adopt and have their child be recognized by the Orthodox community," Rabbi Grover said.

One Toronto Orthodox rabbi spoke to The CJN in 2014 anonymously, and said that some of the requirements go "well beyond what the Halachah requires" and "are not reflective of more modern Orthodoxy."

Rabbi Grover said some of the requirements include that the family be strictly shomer Shabbat and that the child attend an Orthodox Jewish school.

He said he has met many couples who come to him after being rejected by the Orthodox beit din.

"I'm not happy to do those conversions because part of the reason they go to an Orthodox rabbi first is because they know that it will be most recognized by an Orthodox rabbi. They may even attend an Orthodox synagogue themselves, and now they have to leave because I tell them their child will not be able to have a bar mitzvah in an Orthodox shul," he said, adding that he performs about five conversions a year for adopted children.

Jan Silverman, an infertility counsellor who adopted two children when they were both just days old, recalled being rejected after seeking an Orthodox conversion about three decades ago.

"Someone gave me the name of [the late] Rabbi [Gedalia] Felder. I told him that I adopted a child and wanted to have her converted and he said, 'Are you Orthodox?' I said, 'I'm not, but I'm identified, it's a big part of my life. I'm a regular shul-goer, but I'm not Orthodox.' And he said, 'I can't do it, but I can send you to one of my Orthodox colleagues. His reputation is not quite what mine is, but he'll do it.'"

Offended by this offer, she declined.

Silverman, who calls herself a "card-carrying" Reconstructionist Jew, went the Reconstructionist route to convert her children.

Is the BDS movement losing steam?

There was palpable sense of relief within the greater Canadian Jewish community late last week when the Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU) voted to nullify a motion that would have seen the Montreal university's undergraduate association join the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel. As reporter Janice Arnold explains in this week's CJN, the motion passed its first test earlier in the week at the SSMU's general assembly, but ultimately failed when it was put to a ratification vote among the entire undergraduate population (for more on this story, see page 14).

Adding salt to the wounds of the defeated pro-BDS camp at McGill, after the final tally was made public, the university's principal and vice-chancellor, Suzanne Fortier, issued a public statement asserting that BDS "flies in the face of the tolerance and respect we cherish as values fundamental to a university. It proposes actions that are contrary to the principles of academic freedom, equity, inclusiveness and the exchange of views and ideas in responsible, open discourse."

The latest defeat of BDS at McGill, the third in a year and a half, and the fifth since 2010, follows two other major recent victories for the anti-BDS movement in Canada. In late January, University of Waterloo students voted against a BDS motion, and less than two weeks ago, a Conservative-sponsored motion rejecting BDS passed in the House of Commons by a margin of 229 to 51. (The governing Liberal party and Prime Minster Justin Trudeau overwhelmingly supported the motion, though some Liberal members of Parliament voted against it, while others were not present for the vote. The New Democratic Party, meanwhile, voted against the motion, arguing it would infringe on Canadians' freedom of speech, a move that left many wondering what exactly NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair meant when he told The CJN during last year's election campaign, "I think [the BDS movement is] absurd, and I disagree with it.")

It appears BDS has been losing some steam of late, and not only in Canada. A number of American states have passed anti-BDS measures in recent months, while the British Parliament has made public plans to outlaw the boycott movement, and Paris' City Council recently adopted a pair of anti-BDS resolutions. True, BDS remains a concern on many university campuses, including York University in Toronto, where the York Federation of Students passed a resolution endorsing BDS three years ago this month. But even at York, pro-BDS students have recently taken to couching their movement within the effort to force the university to divest from arms manufacturers, perhaps indicating that BDSers are being forced to resort to even sneakier efforts to target Israel. Or maybe it's a tacit admission that the greater student body is simply not buying the anti-Israel message they are selling.

Even so, it seems unlikely that BDS will go away any time soon. Hardworking pro-Israel organizations and indefatigable student groups can still expect to battle for the hearts and minds of students at McGill and York, among other Canadian universities. It's a fight they would surely rather not have to wage. But if they must, recent trends – on campus, in Ottawa and beyond – should at the very least buoy their spirits. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

A memorable season for England's 'Yid Army'

Michael Coren

The English soccer team Tottenham Hotspur, also known as Spurs, is currently experiencing its best season since 1961. The team may well win the Premiership – the top English soccer league and arguably the best in the world – and are considered by experts to be one of the most exciting sides currently playing. They've always been a big, wealthy, North London club, but this year's run to the top of the table is something exceptional. As such, they are on live television almost every week, watched by hundreds of millions of people in every continent.

But what most people don't realize is that Tottenham is known as "The Jewish team," and if you listen carefully, you will hear their fans chanting, "Yids, Yids" or "Yid Army, Yid Army" during their team's matches.

Offensive? Anti-Semitic? Outrageous? Well, just hold on one moment.

I've been a fan of the team for 50 years, largely because my Jewish father was born nearby. Tottenham always had a large number of Jewish supporters, because the catchment area for the club has a sizeable Jewish community. Yet until relatively recently, there were no Jewish owners of the team, and over the years, there has been only one Jewish manager (or coach) and perhaps three or four Jewish players. The latter isn't surprising, in that there are very Jewish managers anyway, and until Israelis started joining European leagues, not many Jews played first-class soccer. But Spurs was always considered Jewish, and from the 1970s, the identification became rigid, for friends as well as enemies.

The point of transition is layered in irony and centres around a television show called Till Death Us Do Part, the inspiration for the American comedy All In The Family. The anti-hero was the character Alf Garnett, a racist and a bigot who followed east London's West Ham United team and disliked almost everyone, including Tottenham and "the Jews up at Spurs." So popular was the show that the Spurs as a Jewish club idea became glued to the wider culture. Garnett, of course, was the symbol of all that was wrong, stupid and undesirable, but nevertheless, his opinions had a certain appeal to some. The irony was that Alf Garnett was played, superbly, by the Jewish actor and lifelong Tottenham fan Warren Mitchell.

Suddenly what was beneath the surface became more visible, even acceptable. Tottenham's main local rival has always been Arsenal, which is the other London team followed by the Jewish community (in fact, there could very well be more Jewish Arsenal fans than Spurs fans). But Arsenal supporters took up the "Jewish Tottenham" theme as well, and soon Spurs were known as "The Yids." With Arsenal, it was often mere banter and provocation – some of the Arsenal fans using the epithet were themselves Jewish. But with two other London teams, the motivation was more sinister.

In the 1970s, the far right in Britain made a concerted attempt to recruit among soccer hooligans. Groups such as the National Front and British Movement, always small and never a genuine political threat, nevertheless caused trouble and were vocal and visible. At Chelsea and West Ham, they had some success. At Chelsea, in particular, there was an organized fascist minority, and when they shouted, "Yids, Yids," they meant it. Worse, they also sang, "We've never felt more like gassing the Jews," and even during a Spurs game against Chelsea made hissing sounds that were supposed to indicate the noise of Nazi gas chambers.

Such obscenities have been illegal for some years, and, anyway, the far right dribbled away and such a hateful culture, always the preserve of a fringe extreme, simply doesn't exist anymore in English soccer. So now it's almost unheard of for anybody else in a stadium other than Tottenham supporters to chant "Yids." Spurs fans have owned the word, taken possession of it and refused to give it up. They have even occasionally waved Israeli flags. (This phenomenon is not, by the way, confined to England, and it's particularly common in the Netherlands, where the famous Ajax of Amsterdam in considered a Jewish team.)

It's all rather contrived and artificial, and nothing like as visceral and political as the Glasgow division between overwhelmingly Protestant Rangers and Catholic Celtic, but it still divides opinion. There are many people, including the Premiership officials, who would prefer if the word "Yid" was never heard again, and there have even been moves to arrest people who use it. But it would be impossible to stop 10,000 or 20,000 people from chanting a word, and the greater the attempt to expunge it, the louder the fans will sing.

I'm sure that many Canadians reading this will be incredulous, but as someone who is deeply sensitive to anti-Semitism, I can say with confidence that I haven't considered the Tottenham chants to be linked to anything racist in almost 30 years. Remember, sport – and certainly soccer in Europe – is far more tribal than in North America and also more working-class. It can't be too regulated and probably shouldn't be too regulated.

The problem now is not England but the Continent. Small groups of ultra-rightist thugs have attacked Tottenham fans in Italy, for example, because they assume that the people they are fighting are Jewish. In actual fact, in all of these incidents, that hasn't been the case.

The next couple of years will be fascinating. The seating capacity of Tottenham's stadium is to be almost doubled, the England national team will be one-third composed of Spurs players, and we can only hope that the team lives up to expectations and becomes truly great. At that point, the pressure to change what is said and sung might be insurmountable. But I wouldn't count on that happening. I really wouldn't. ■

As food prices rise, kosher consumers are struggling

Shoppers are being more cautious at the supermarket, while high costs are forcing some to compromise on their adherence to kashrut

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Economic data can sometimes be impenetrable to the average person, especially when it refers to items like consumer surplus or foreign exchange rates. But consumer surplus and the value of the Canadian dollar can have a real-world impact on the daily lives of people when they roll their shopping carts down the kosher aisle and are confronted with prices that never seem to go down.

If you do any shopping, you'll notice that food prices have taken a jump in recent months, beyond what veteran shoppers might have noticed in the last five years.

It's not just kosher consumers who are affected. Everyone is paying more, as recent data compiled by Statistics Canada reveal.

Looking at the year that ended in January, the federal agency reported that food prices were up by four per cent, but that certain items, such as fresh vegetables, jumped by 18.2 per cent.

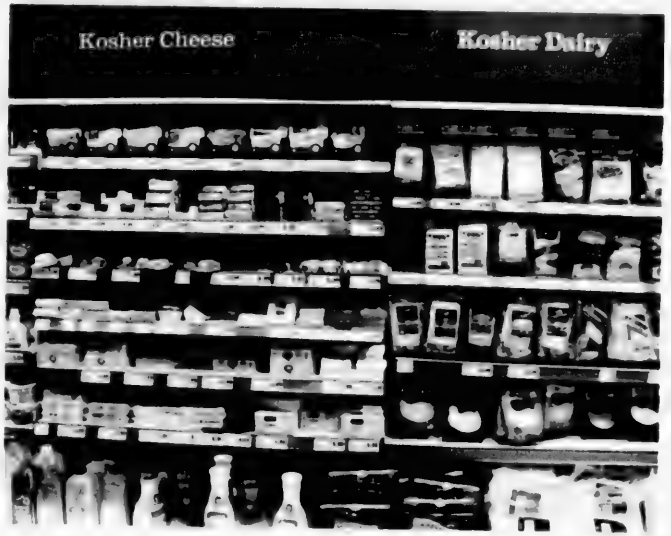
In a more detailed report that looked at average retail prices for a variety of consumer products, including meat, vegetables, fruit and household items, Statistics Canada reported that from December 2014 to December 2015, the cost of a kilogram of sirloin steak, not a kosher cut, rose by 14.3 per cent. Prime rib, which can be a kosher cut, rose by 12 per cent. Ground beef went up by six per cent and stewing beef by 6.8 per cent.

Even lowly macaroni, a staple for families, rose by 12.5 per cent in the year.

Vegans and vegetarians are feeling the pinch even more. The price of carrots rose by 13.8 per cent in the last year. Onions were up by 16.6 per cent; potatoes by 13.7 per cent; mushrooms by 7.2 per cent; and celery rose in price by a whopping 46.3 per cent in just one year.

So what can kosher consumers do?

Avi Moyal is a price-conscious shopper who picks up the groceries for his family of six every week or so. He makes a point of shopping at stores that price-match the competition and he uses a handy smartphone app, called Flipp, to get the best prices.



Jewish families are finding it hard to deal with increased food costs. PAUL LUNGEN PHOTOS

With Flipp, he said, you can download grocers' weekly flyers and present the best price to supermarkets such as Walmart, No Frills and Superstore, which match prices. He figures he saves about $30 on a weekly grocery bill of $250, and it helps avoid the need to drive from store to store to get the best price.

Moyal, a Toronto real estate agent, enjoys purchasing groceries and has been doing it ever since he was a kid accompanying his mom on shopping expeditions. He's noticed a big jump in price in recent months.

A couple of years ago, you could find kosher feta cheese for around $6 a pound. A few months ago the price was around $7, and now it's in the $10 range. "We can do without it," he said, substituting shredded cheese instead.

A couple of weeks ago, he spotted a particular kosher cheese on sale for $3.50, down from its regular price of $5, so he bought three packages.

"You're not eliminating anything," he said. "You just have to be more cautious."

The family still eats beef and a lot of fish, though chicken is no longer a big part of their menu.

"From what I've seen, it's not just kosher where the price has gone up," he said. "Beef and chicken have always been expensive. If you've been buying it for years, you're used to it."

Alison Finkelstein does the shopping for her family of seven. "I'm on a tight budget, so I should be price conscious. I try my best to only buy things that are on sale or less expensive," the Toronto-area resident said.

You'll find a couple of packages of chopped meat and two chickens in her shopping cart every week. Red meat has gone up substantially. She's paying $13 for the same package of beef that cost $10 only a few months ago. "I couldn't believe it – $13 for one package of chopped meat," she said.

Finkelstein was in Florida recently and noticed that groceries are a lot cheaper there and the selection is better.

A big box of Fruit Loops cereal – a special treat for her kids – cost $10 in Toronto, but only $5 in Florida.

"Things are generally more in Canada," she said, but she was "shocked" by the jump in price in only the last few months.

"I haven't changed my shopping habits, with five growing kids. You can't cut back too much," she added.

Institutional shoppers are feeling the pinch as well.

Gina Carvalho, director of food and nutrition services at Baycrest, which operates the Toronto Jewish community's largest seniors residence, said that "Baycrest's annual nutritional budget review process from fiscal year 2014-15 to 2015-16 saw an average increase of 18 per cent on the price of kosher meat.

"Kosher produce also increased significantly that year. As such, we built our 2016-17 food budget around these predictors. However, so far we are not seeing the same increase in the cost of kosher meat for 2016-17.

"Our suppliers have also been very supportive of our needs, helping us mitigate kosher food costs, some through volume discounts due to our size and because of who we are and the care we give to members of the community."

Fran Chodak, co-ordinator of Jewish Family & Child Services' STEP (Striving to End Poverty) project in Toronto, has seen the impact of rising food prices on some of the more vulnerable members of the Jewish community.

"From our experience, observations and conversations with clients and colleagues, families are struggling with the increase of food costs," Chodak said.

"Food is the prerequisite to health, and it is well documented that poverty is linked to higher rates of diabetes, cardiovascular disease, hypertension and some forms of cancers.

"When food costs are high, people are less likely to invite friends and family to dinner, and this exacerbates social exclusion – an unfortunate impact of poverty," she said.

"The high cost of kosher food, in some cases, means people are having to compromise their adherence to the laws of kashrut, and this may be a very difficult ethical, moral and spiritual decision, causing feelings of guilt and shame. Some clients have told me that, due to the cost, they only buy kosher meat for Shabbat. Some only buy kosher meat for holidays. Some are forgoing kosher altogether.

"With Passover around the corner, I suspect it is going to be especially hard this year due to the low Canadian dollar and packaged kosher for Passover foods coming from the United States," she said.

Susan Karpman shares the same concerns in Montreal. As chief program officer for Agence Ometz, which provides social services to the Jewish community, she's seen the number of people served by the agency increase. She's also noticed that more lower middle class, middle class and even some well-to-do people who are "struggling with food costs," are seeking the agency's help.

The agency has experience in helping people plan their budget to prioritize their spending, she said.

There is also an increased demand for community resources, such as food baskets and assistance, and clients are seeking the agency's assistance to help plan their holiday shopping.

The agency is seeing "more dramatic cultural changes in what people are eating," she said. As an example, she pointed to some Sephardi families' Shabbat meals, which can be extensive, with lots of courses and dishes. "People are having to pare that down," she said.

Dave Wilkes of the Retail Council of Canada confirms the impact of the currency on prices of all U.S. imports.

"The primary driver of the increasing cost is the Canadian dollar," he said. "As the dollar has depreciated, you are seeing the purchasing power of Canadian grocers affected."

About 80 per cent of the produce in supermarkets is imported "and those contracts are in U.S. dollars. Because they're fresh, the fluctuating dollar will have an almost immediate effect on our prices. It affects kosher and non-kosher [imports]."

As for the rising cost of beef, Wilkes said "a lot relates to the feed and the costs associated with that." Shortages in feed, thanks in part to strong demand for it internationally, made it more expensive, thus driving up the cost of producing beef, he said.

> When food costs are high, people are less likely to invite friends and family to dinner, and this exacerbates social exclusion.

Joseph Bitton, president of Gaton's Foods, a kosher distribution company in Toronto, said that on some products – such as grape juice – the price of kosher brands has been held in check because of the growth in the number of Canadian distributors. Other consumer items, like kosher beef, will be more expensive than non-kosher equivalents because of the added costs associated with kashrut.

Bitton said that 10 years ago, there were only three or four companies that "controlled kosher, and they worked on very large profit margins. Now there is a lot more competition, and the profit margins went down." Today there are nine kosher product distributors, "and that does not include manufacturers who sell directly."

He pointed to two brands of grape juice – Kedem and Nature's Own – as an example. Because they're brought in by competitors, their prices closely match the non-kosher brands, he said.

Some kosher products, however, will be more expensive because of the added costs associated with making sure they meet kosher standards. One is canned tuna, a product Bitton distributes in Toronto.

There are added costs of flying a mashgiach (kashrut supervisor) from New York to fishing vessels in the Far East. They remain there for weeks, supervising the cooking of the tuna on board.

Other products, such as beef and chicken, also require "more intensive supervision" so it would be unfair to compare them to non-kosher equivalents. "You're not comparing the same process," he said.

Richard Rabkin, spokesperson for the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada, which administers the COR hechsher, said "much of the increased cost of food is a result of weaker Canadian dollar, which effectively adds approximately 30 per cent to the cost of food imported from the United States. This is likely the chief reason for the increased costs, as many of the specialty kosher brands and items are manufactured in the United States, such as cheese, chalav yisrael dairy products, prepared/frozen foods and the like."

As for the cost of meat, Rabkin stated that the Kashruth Council does not prohibit outside kosher meat from entering the city, but that "many of these sources originate from the United States, which are subject to fluctuations in the Canadian dollar."

MK, Montreal's kosher certification agency, agreed that, "There have been various increases in the price of cattle, which have resulted in the increased cost of meat, in general... Non-Kosher meat prices have also increased substantially."

Asked if MK was concerned that this may lead some people to avoid kosher food, the agency responded: "We are always concerned about consumers not purchasing kosher food products and are therefore always encouraging the reduction of prices across the board and meeting with producers to see how this can be achieved.

"Consumers should contact the local suppliers on a constant basis, urging them to be competitive and reduce prices, wherever possible," the agency added. ■

Why we need a legal response to BDS

Aidan Fishman

On Feb. 22, McGill University's undergraduate student union endorsed the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel at its annual general meeting, before failing to ratify it online by a 60 to 40 per cent margin. About a month ago, a similar initiative was rejected in a student referendum at the University of Waterloo by 55 to 45 per cent.

Waterloo is widely considered one of Canada's most apolitical universities, hardly conducive to the sort of far-left activism that typically drives BDS offensives. And yet, almost half of student voters supported an initiative to sever exchange and research ties between Waterloo and Israeli tech giants such as the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, which would have directly harmed Waterloo students.

Meanwhile, last week's events at McGill marked the third time in 18 months that anti-Israel fanatics tried to pass a BDS motion. All these efforts failed by narrow margins, due to the heroic efforts of Jewish student organizers. But in such an atmosphere, it seemed inevitable that BDS devotees would eke out a victory. Most worryingly, the McGill branch of the NDP joined other so-called progressive student groups in backing BDS. (Last week, the NDP caucus in the House of Commons voted against a motion to condemn BDS.)

Of course, there are other problematic Canadian universities, including York, Concordia and McMaster, where the fight over Israel has already been lost, triggering a struggle to safeguard Jewish campus life in any form. At York, in particular, the situation has deteriorated to the point where at least one Jewish donor felt compelled to withdraw his support, and blatantly anti-Semitic claims of a "Jewish conspiracy" are part and parcel of student politics.

So in the face of these threats, what can we do as a Jewish community?

We should take a hint from Britain, where the government recently announced its intention to ban public bodies such as student unions, labour unions and municipalities from boycotting Israel. After all, similar legislation is already on the books here in Canada. Ontario and Manitoba both have a Discriminatory Business Practices Act, which makes it illegal for any person or corporation to refuse to do business with a second person or corporation on account of race, creed, nationality or even geographical location. In fact, this legislation was enacted in Ontario in 1971 specifically to combat the Arab League boycott of Israel, the spiritual predecessor of the modern BDS movement. The act applies both to wholesale boycotts of Israel as well as more limited efforts aimed at Israelis living in the West Bank, and describes fines of up to $25,000 against individual violators and $100,000 against offending corporations.

Further, most Canadian student and labour unions incorporate broad anti-discrimination clauses into their by-laws or constitutions. Often, these clauses include prohibitions against discrimination by nationality, which is practically the definition of BDS. They serve both to illustrate the hypocrisy of these Israel-boycotting groups and expose them to legal liability stemming from their own governing documents. Indeed, the constitution of McGill's undergraduate student union contains just such an anti-discrimination clause.

It's puzzling that no Canadian Jewish organization has chosen to sue labour unions and student groups engaging in anti-Israel discrimination. While opponents will claim legal action undermines democratic endorsements of BDS, it should be noted that neither labour nor student unions are typically shining examples of democracy in action, as their members will tell you.

But more importantly, litigation by minority groups is not in principle anti-democratic – on the contrary, it is the hallmark of a properly calibrated liberal democracy. Just as other minorities such as African-Canadians, the LGBTQ community and First Nations have used the courts to make their voices heard, Canadian Jews must take full advantage of legal opportunities to rescue our youth from the deteriorating atmosphere of harassment and discrimination on campus. ■

If the price were lower, would they come?

Daniel Held

We are blessed with remarkable Jewish day schools. Schools that offer Jewish studies that empower youth with the skills, knowledge, attitudes and aptitudes to lead active Jewish lives. Schools with stellar general studies that prepare students for entrance into the toughest university programs. Schools that offer athletics and arts, extracurriculars and guidance, special education and enrichment, cutting-edge technology and competitive facilities.

As the people of the Book, a people that has been sustained by a commitment to education, these are the schools that we should build and sustain. But it is expensive. Precisely because it is remarkable, it is expensive.

The question that dogs me day in and day out is how do we create remarkable schools – schools to which we want to send our children – that are less expensive?

The starting point to answering this question is an examination of the cost structure of schools.

Across Jewish day schools – and, in truth, across most schools – 80 per cent of costs are devoted to human resources: the teachers, support workers, principals and curriculum designers who we charge with educating our children. Any sea change in the cost of schooling will be the result of changes to human resources.

Two types of new lower-cost schools have emerged, but each raises questions.

The first is a school that returns to basics. Today's schools offer a significantly lower staff to student ratio than schools of the past. Not only are classes smaller, but more administrators, specialists, teaching aids and other adults serve students. The result is that each of today's students is carrying a higher proportion of a full-time salary. New back-to-basics schools maximize the staff to student ratio, often foregoing what is perceived as non-core areas of schooling such as co-curricular activities, guidance, etc.

The second type of school offers disruptive new models of teaching and learning.

For generations, the model of school has not changed significantly. It takes one teacher 10 months to teach a year's curriculum to a group of 18 to 30 students. While we have progressed from the one-room schoolhouse to multi-classroom schools, modified methodologies and integrated technology, the core cost structure of schools has not changed.

Increasingly, schools that look and feel different are being developed. Blended learning schools that mix online learning with traditional brick-and-mortar classes, work-experience-based schools that structure curriculum around internships to prepare students for the "real" world, and schools designed around team teaching and team learning that turn the 30-student classroom on its head are all models of innovative education that offer both 21st-century models of teaching and learning while significantly changing the cost structure of education.

So what's the problem? What do we have to weigh for our schools to transition to these newer models?

While the theory behind each of these innovations is compelling, quality educational research is longitudinal, requiring a multi-year evaluation of the impact on students' knowledge and skill development. It is because of this long view that education is inherently conservative, shirking change in favour of tried and tested models.

While I might buy into the theory, am I willing to risk my child's education to a school that's experimental, where the methodologies have not been tested and proven over long periods of time?

We can create Jewish day schools at a significantly lower price. Doing so, however, will create schools that look and feel different than today's offerings, and may in fact not offer as many services, and so I ask: if we lower the price, will they come? How do we create remarkable schools, schools to which we want to send our children and which are less expensive? ■

A sense of wonder at the Kotel

Jean M. Gerber

Following years of violence against mixed-gender and all-female prayer groups at the Western Wall – experienced by some of my Vancouver friends – it seems that an agreement has been reached. Egalitarian prayer groups will be accorded a significant prayer place at the Kotel.

Women who wanted to pray in all-female or mixed minyanim, even separated from the main area, were often spat on, had trash thrown on them.

The main plaza became less and less accessible, even to those of us who would use the Orthodox women's section. We were admonished, not gently, if we appeared without "modest" dress. Once, I inadvertently stood with my foot up against the stone to brace me, and in a flash, I was hit on the shoulder and warned. The spot was sacred.

Come on. Herod's dying slaves built that spot, for goodness sake. Their sad deaths may make it holy, but in itself it is stone and dust.

Holiness: we attach it to many things, despite being told that our actions make us and those around us holy, not the stone and wood of our physical world.

But I digress. Today we celebrate.

Since the day I saw the Kotel from a dirty little alleyway between houses and the Wall (1964), and then saw it years later from the Israeli side (1971), not yet cleared of rubble but already opening its arms to welcome its children back, that spot has been for me a place of wonder.

When confronted with, when drawn inexorably toward the Kotel, I felt – what? Awe that it still stood, after 2,000 years, as testimony to the time when all Israel turned towards it in awe? A deep sense of historical connection to this spot? The place where 2,000 years ago the People of Israel felt touched by the sacred?

Wonder: both atheist Oliver Sachs and Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel agreed that the sense of wonder should pervade us.

> We can, I know, find in everyday prayer a sense of touching something outside ourselves.

For Sachs, wonder was to be found within the human brain. There, he found sublime content. While in a moving essay written just before his death, he recalled his family home (a bitter-sweet memory) and the meaning he felt in celebrating Shabbat with his Orthodox family in Israel, still, the Creator was not a source of wonder for him, but the creation.

For Rabbi Heschel, Judaism is a religion of time, time in which we can experience wonder. He differed with Sachs. "The sense of wonder for His creation," he writes in The Prophets, "is common to all men." For Jews, however, it derives from the reaching out of God to us, and from us to God.

If we can stand in a place so fraught with life and death as the walls around the Temple Mount, then in whatever space we stand, we stand in a place of wonder.

It has been many years since I felt those emotions that gripped me the first times I davened at the Kotel. So when I next get to stand there, mindful of the ordinary 2,000-year-old street on which a platform will be raised, ready for prayer, I hope to achieve what Rabbi Heschel advises: "Prayer takes the mind out of the narrowness of self-interest and enables us to see the world in the mirror of the holy… Prayer teaches us what to aspire for… Prayer implants in us the ideals we ought to cherish."

We can, I know, find in everyday prayer a sense of touching something outside ourselves. Maybe only occasionally, but when it happens we know it. How much more so at this Wall.

So – at the Kotel is it because we stand in wonder where ordinary people walked so long ago or plied their trade? Or is it because we can almost touch in wonder the place where Israel celebrated its festivals? Because it is a fraught moment of prayer?

It's all of these – sheer wonder. ■

Israel blamed as Hamas' tunnel vision hurts Gazans

Paul Michaels

Last month, Hamas bragged about how much progress it was making digging tunnels from Gaza into Israel.

Senior Hamas official Mahmoud Zahar claimed "the tunnels reach deep into the territory occupied in 1948," his way of referring to all of Israel as "occupied" Palestinian land.

In the 2014 Gaza war, Israel uncovered 32 tunnels, many reaching as far as Israeli kibbutzim and villages near the Gaza border. All of them posed a grave threat to Israeli security – not only to IDF soldiers, but also to Israeli civilians who are vulnerable to kidnapping or murder.

While it was reported that the IDF destroyed the tunnels discovered during the war, in fact, they were not entirely demolished, with just major parts, like entry and exit points and some elements in between, destroyed. Hamas has been busy since then both reconstructing these tunnels and building new ones.

The prospect of yet more Hamas tunnels intruding into Israel to be used in the next round of fighting is unnerving to Israelis, hence the recent stern Israeli government warnings to Hamas.

With the Iron Dome anti-missile defence system, the IDF was able during the last war to intercept almost all missiles fired from Gaza that posed a threat to civilian centres, but Israel had no such high-tech system for discovering tunnels.

And it appears, almost two years later, that it still lacks such a system. In the first week of February, Israel's State Comptroller criticized the IDF for "gaps and failures, some severe, in the readiness for the tunnel threat."

IDF Chief of Staff Gadi Eisenkot responded to the criticism by explaining that the army was indeed working on the problem – mostly in secret – and was in possession of what he termed "advanced capabilities."

Israel's Channel 2 TV recently reported that, for over a decade, the IDF has invested $250 million (US) in tunnel-detection technology. Other reports have pointed to joint Israel-U.S. research projects aimed at tunnel detection.

Some analysts believe Hamas has been racing ahead with tunnel construction in order to beat these detection efforts, assuming that once completed and thus "silent," the tunnels won't be detectable. If, however, the underground defence system Israel is developing proves capable of sensing even completed tunnels, Hamas will have lost its advantage – foremost, its reliance on the element of surprise.

Amid heated rhetoric between Israel and Hamas, and speculation about the possibility of renewed conflict – including calls from highly respected Israeli military analysts like Amos Yadlin for a pre-emptive strike on the tunnels – western media have started to pay more attention to this story.

What has not been noted, however, is the cost borne by Gaza's 1.8 million residents, many of whose homes were damaged or destroyed in the 2014 war – a conflict started by Hamas. These homes were supposed to have been repaired or rebuilt, ironically using cement Israel shipped into Gaza under "strict international supervision" to avoid diversion of the cement to tunnels.

As it turns out, virtually no civilian structures have been rebuilt. The owners sold their allotted cement on the "black market," which means to Hamas for tunnel construction.

It has been calculated that Hamas used 1.5 million tons of cement for the military tunnels and bunkers in existence during the 2014 war, enough cement to have built an above-ground city for Gaza's people.

Meanwhile, Israel receives no credit for its humanitarian measures, including daily supplies to Gaza of tons of food, medicine, fuel and other necessities. Instead, Israel's efforts to keep rockets and other weapons out of the hands of Hamas and other terrorist organizations are typically depicted in the West as the Jewish state's punitive, grossly unfair blockade.

Hamas was elected to look after the needs of Gaza's civilians. Instead, Hamas callously ignores them in pursuit of its obsessive, self-destructive anti-Israel campaign.

Gaza's economy suffers because of Hamas' policy. Israel is blamed. It's an old story. ■

Embassy to sponsor Noa concert after JNF pulls support

DANIEL KOREN

After JNF Canada withdrew support for an upcoming Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration it co-sponsors with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) every year over the appearance of left-wing Israeli singer Achinoam Nini, the Israeli Embassy and the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto have stepped in to support the event.

"As official representatives of the State of Israel, we see support from the embassy and the consulate as strong messages that there is room for diversity both within Israel and within our community," said JFGV board chair Stephen Gaerber.

More than 50 Jewish community groups will take part in the May 11 event at Vancouver's Chan Centre.

JNF Canada cited the participation of Nini – known as Noa – as its reason for cancelling. "The entertainer that has been hired does not reflect nor correspond to the mandate and values of the Jewish National Fund of Canada," CEO Josh Cooper said in a statement last month.

The decision followed a Jerusalem Post article, since taken down, that reported Vancouver Jews were "outraged" over Nini's performance, alleging that she supports the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel. An online petition titled "Stop Achinoam Nini from performing at our Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration" had 418 signatures as of last week.

The group Vancouver United with Israel denounced Nini for her support of B'Tselem, a group that monitors human rights in the West Bank, and Breaking the Silence, a left-wing NGO that criticizes the IDF.

Nini denies being a supporter of BDS, which, in a Facebook post earlier this month, she said is "a hypocritical movement full of contradictions that will not bring peace to Israel nor help the Palestinians achieve their goals."

Israel's Foreign Ministry said last week that "Israel sees great importance in having Jewish communities around the world mark and celebrate the State of Israel's Independence Day. As the official representatives of the State of Israel, the embassy and consulate work constantly to promote the unity of the Jewish People and the Canadian Jewish community's ties with the State of Israel."

In a Feb. 24 open letter to Cooper, geriatrician Mark Clarfield, a Canadian oleh and professor of medicine at Ben-Gurion University, urged JNF to reconsider.

"Not only is the JNF decision ill-founded, but… it is based on a totally false accusation about [Nini's] supposed support for BDS. Now that it is clear to the JNF that its decision was based on inaccurate information, the menschlich thing to do would be to apologize for the misunderstanding and renew the support for her performance," he wrote. "Not taking this step will make us all wonder about JNF Canada's true motivation which to the outsider appears to be a very narrow right-wing attack on a true artist and patriot."

On Feb. 25, JNF released a new statement from Cooper and JNF Canada president Jerry Werger, in which they said they were "concerned" Nini had been chosen, because she's "generated divisiveness both in Israel and throughout [the] Diaspora."

Achinoam Nini

"We consulted with Keren Keyemeth Leisrael senior staff, JNF Canada and JNF Pacific region leadership to discuss our responsibility to our constituency, many of whom had expressed discomfort with the artist's views and organizational affiliations. At no time did we claim that the artist supported BDS. We contacted JFGV and agreed to disagree on the choice of entertainment, and respectfully decided to take a one-year hiatus from sponsorship of the event," they wrote.

"We want to be absolutely clear that JNF Canada is not protesting, boycotting, delegitimizing or censoring this event. After hearing from so many of our donors, we simply are not comfortable using charitable funds to support this particular artist."

They added: "Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations and other community events should be inclusive," and said JNF has "demonstrated that this is not a position only addressing one side of the political spectrum."

They were alluding to a controversy over JNF's invitation to ex-Republican U.S. presidential candidate Mike Huckabee to speak at Ottawa's 2015 Negev Dinner, which raised the ire of LGBTQ groups and some Jews over his comments about transgender people.

"Last year, we had contracted a guest speaker who represented the right side of the political spectrum. Subsequently, his comments caused a division within the local Jewish community. Once this became apparent, we cancelled the contracted speaker and brought in a different presenter who appealed to a substantially wider audience," they said.

"JNF respects Judaism's rich tradition of debate and dissent. Nevertheless, we hold Jewish community harmony as our utmost priority. We want to make it clear that while we have had disagreement around one choice of entertainment for an event, we look forward to continue working with federations from coast to coast, especially celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut together in Vancouver in 2017."

In a letter of support to the JFGV, Natan Sharansky, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, said "there are many different opinions and strident arguments about the road to peace. But in no way can we allow for differences of opinion to undermine those core values which unite us in our desire for a strong Jewish future with a strong Jewish democratic Israel at the centre," he said

He added, that "in these turbulent days, when enemies on the outside strive to delegitimize Israel, there must be a place within for a broad range of views" and said he's "often had the pleasure of enjoying Noa's outstanding voice and spectacular talent."

"I applaud the Vancouver federation and I know your Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations will be wonderful. "■

Consumers still waiting for Ontario kosher chickens

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

If you visit the website of the Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO), one of the first items you'll see is a slide show titled, "Meeting Consumer Market Needs."

It's a claim that might come as a surprise to Ontario consumers of kosher chickens, who have been waiting for a year and a half for the CFO to pick a winner in the kosher chicken sweepstakes.

Since the demise of Chai Poultry in May 2013, the Jewish community has faced shortages of kosher chickens and voiced complaints over the quality of poultry imported into the province by Marvid, a supplier based in Quebec.

Those concerns have been heard at the CFO, a producers' group that regulates the provincial poultry quota with authority from the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture.

Nearly two years ago, the CFO invited bids for a substantial allotment of kosher chickens – about 50,000 birds a week – and Michael Edmonds, director of communications and government relations for the CFO, stated at the time that consumers could expect Ontario kosher chickens by the end of 2014.

But in the nearly two years since bids were solicited, the agency still has not chosen a kosher chicken supplier. Seven groups were part of the initial bid, and three were finalists, but all three have withdrawn. Two new groups are now being considered, and the CFO has turned to Deloitte, a consulting firm, for assistance in choosing the best bid.

As consumers wait for a resolution to the issue, representatives of two of the three original finalists spoke to The CJN and described a process they say was unfair and destined to result in gridlock. Questions were also raised about the role of the Kashruth Council of Canada, known as COR, which they say was collaborating with the CFO to ensure that only groups using their kashrut certification would be acceptable to the CFO.

Contacted by The CJN and asked to respond to several detailed questions, Edmonds responded: "CFO has engaged Deloitte to review all new applications from a business and economic perspective. We are following a disciplined fact-based review process, and as such, we are not in a position to make further comments at this time."

For its part, COR said it recognizes the need for an Ontario-based provider of kosher chickens, and it has advocated "aggressively" so that approvals will be granted.

Montreal's Marvid is still the only supplier, two years into process to find a local one.

"This process has indeed been a long one, and we have assisted the CFO whenever asked... The CFO is the sole decision maker as to which party it will grant the quota for kosher processing, and they have advised us that the parties which they selected to present their proposals in the final round were successful based on the strength of their business plans and for no other reason," COR's Richard Rabkin said in a statement.

"With respect to granting exclusivity, COR never made any such commitment to anyone and any assertion to the contrary is entirely false," Rabkin added.

Morley Rand, a former employee of COR who has faced off against the kashrut certifier in a number of court cases related to employment issues, has asked the Competition Bureau of Canada to look into the relationship between COR and the CFO.

The Competition Bureau acknowledged it has received Rand's complaint, but, citing confidentiality, said it would not discuss specifics. However, in an email to Rand, the bureau said it has appointed an officer to look into the claim.

Avi Kraman was a member of one of the initial groups that applied to the CFO to obtain an allotment of chickens for the kosher market. Danny Diena was part of a second group. The third finalist included Danny Soberano from Allseas Fisheries.

Based on conversations with senior personnel at the CFO and on the nature of the questions his group was asked to address at a presentation before the organization's board, Kraman believes the CFO was co-operating with COR to ensure the successful applicant employed COR for its kashrut supervision.

McGill BDS motion defeated in student-wide vote

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

McGill University undergraduates have rejected a boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) motion that was approved last week at a general assembly of their student association, and the university administration issued an unequivocal repudiation of the anti-Israel campaign.

Members of the Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU), members voted 2,819-2,119, with 68 abstentions, online over three days last week, nullifying the motion put forward by the McGill BDS Action Network at the SSMU winter general assembly on Feb. 22. At that time, the motion passed 512-357, with 14 abstentions, in secret balloting.

SSMU rules require that all motions carried at general assemblies must be ratified by the membership at large, with a quorum of 10 per cent.

The SSMU represents the approximately 22,000 undergraduates at McGill's main downtown campus.

Immediately after the results were released Feb. 27, McGill principal and vice-chancellor Suzanne Fortier issued a statement that the university administration "steadfastly oppose[s]" the BDS campaign.

It was the third time in less than 1-1/2 years that pro-BDS students have failed to have a motion adopted. The latest was a general endorsement of the aims of the worldwide campaign launched in 2005 and included a specific demand that McGill divest its holdings in three companies the Network claims are "profiting from violations of Palestinians' human rights" due to their alleged complicity in Israel's occupation.

The No side worked actively to get students to vote against the BDS motion.

This was the fifth attempt to get BDS support on the student record since 2010.

With 57 per cent of SSMU voters refusing to ratify the motion, Fortier stated: "The university as an institution has not commented publicly until now out of respect for the student governance process. Students respect our governance process. We do not interfere with theirs, or their right to put such motions within the context of their affairs…

"[W]hile we respect the freedom of expression of all members of our community, the administration of the university will have no part of the BDS movement."

She said the campaign's call for universities to cut ties with Israeli universities "flies in the face of the tolerance and respect we cherish as values fundamental to a university. It proposes actions that are contrary to the principles of academic freedom, equity, inclusiveness and the exchange of views and ideas in responsible, open discourse."

McGill has extensive academic relations with Israeli institutions going back many years.

The ratification failure and the university administration's strong position on the issue of BDS were hailed by Jewish groups.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) termed it "the victory of reason over hate."

CIJA Quebec co-chair Rabbi Reuben Poupko said the defeat of the motion "demonstrates that McGill students reject BDS and value intellectual freedom and the right to healthy and constructive debate. McGill students have clearly indicated, for the third time in 18 months, that BDS is unwelcome on their campus because it stigmatizes people for holding a different point of view."

Some pro-Israel students reported experiencing insulting and hostile remarks, particularly on social media, since the motion was first proposed at the beginning of February.

B'nai Brith Canada said pro-Israel students at McGill have felt "targeted and unsafe" and "fear reprisals for speaking out," in the words of Toronto-based CEO Michael Mostyn.

"The boycott organizers have bullied students over the course of three years, continuously raising the issue and intimidating dissenters until the motion was passed," he said.

"BDS is an incessant and relentless attack against the national liberation movement of the Jewish People in its promotion of the belief that Jews are the only people in the world who do not deserve their own homeland," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"While it is to the credit of the undergraduate body that they have once again rejected this discriminatory campaign, the level of hate directed at Jewish students, including comments referencing 'little Zionist Jewboys' on social media following the original student motion in favour of BDS, demonstrates how entrenched anti-Semitism on our university campuses has become."

President Evan Feldman and CEO Deborah Corber of Montreal's Federation CJA congratulated the "around-the-clock" effort, "often in a hostile environment," of pro-Israel students to mobilize their peers to vote down the motion.

They conceded that the battle is not over, however. "[T]he fight against BDS will require a sustained effort on the part of the community," including "combat[ing] any instance of harassment and anti-Semitism" students may encounter in defending Israel.

In a Feb. 25 statement, the pro-BDS Network, which claims the endorsement of 19 student clubs and campus organizations, "acknowledge[d] the concerns that have been raised about anti-Semitism on campus, and recognize[d] that this is a reality for many Jewish students."

The following day, it "strongly condemned the active campaigning efforts and tactics used by various students, professors and student groups" opposed to the motion, which it said violated SSMU rules against campaigning during the ratification process.

The violations it said it documented consist of "intimidation" and the use of "external organizations… to disseminate misinformation," including professional public relations firms.

Specifically, the Network said "fraudulent" Reddit and Instagram accounts were created with its name and logo, and it dissociated itself from their content.

The original motion was passed by the SSMU general assembly the same day the House of Commons passed a motion formally condemning BDS. The parliamentary motion passed by a vote of 229-51. It calls on the Canadian government to "condemn any and all attempts by Canadian organizations, groups, or individuals to promote the BDS movement, both here at home, and abroad." ■

Ex-Toronto day school head arrested for child porn

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The one-time director of Leo Baeck School in Toronto was arrested in California earlier this month on child pornography charges.

David Prashker, 60, was charged Feb. 22 with possession and distribution of child pornography and attempting to destroy evidence.

Prashker served as director of Leo Baeck School from 2004 to 2008, when he resigned over violent and sexually explicit poetry he wrote and posted online.

On Feb. 18, members of the Contra Costa Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) Task Force, northeast of San Francisco, attempted to serve Prashker with a search warrant at his home in Lafayette.

According to local reports, Prashker fled to the rear of the house and threw a laptop from a second storey into the backyard. Investigators discovered that the computer's hard drive contained evidence of child pornography.

Prashker's bail was set at $205,000. He did not post bail, and he remained in custody as of last week.

In an email to The CJN, Jordan Sanders, the deputy district attorney assigned to the case, said Prashker pleaded not guilty at an arraignment Feb. 23. The defence requested he be released on his own recognizance with a GPS ankle monitor.

"I objected to the release based on the defendant's potential flight risk and the seriousness of the charges," Sanders wrote. "The judge denied the release from custody."

Prashker's preliminary hearing was scheduled for March 3.

Prashker made headlines in Toronto in 2008 when his poetry was found to contain graphic allusions to sex and murder.

In one poem, Voluntary Admission, he wrote, "I raped her lust I confess," while in another, he described "the first act of killing [as] the hardest… and the second time is remarkably straightforward."

Another verse spoke of an "earth-shaking, messianic orgasm."

Prashker tendered his resignation in August, 2008 after parents complained that the poetry was inappropriate and that posting it online reflected poor judgment. Parents were alerted to the poems via an anonymous email.

A native of London, England, Prashker was recruited in 2004 to run Leo Baeck, Canada's only Reform day school. Its two campuses have about 800 students from kindergarten through Grade 8.

He most recently worked as a substitute teacher at two private schools in central Contra Costa County, according to the local CBS affiliate, KPIX.

David Prashker

California investigators said the schools where Prashker taught have been notified and there is no evidence at this point that he engaged in any crimes involving students of either school.

Officials at Leo Baeck were "appalled" to hear the news about Prashker, head of school Eric Petersiel told The CJN via email.

But they have had "no contact with Mr. Prashker in the eight years since he and the school parted ways. As I am sure you can understand, the interests and security of our students is paramount in everything we do as a school," Petersiel stated.

KPIX reported that in California, Prashker continued to be "a Jewish community leader and fundraiser, and has apparently spent the past few years working to build BibleNet, an educational online encyclopedia regarding the Jewish and Christian scriptures."

He faces a maximum penalty of 44 months in prison and fines if convicted on all charges. ■

Former teacher facing new sex assault charges

CJN STAFF

Stephen Joseph Schacter, a former teacher at two Toronto-area Jewish day schools, was re-arrested last week in connection with several new sexual offences.

Schacter, 55, was charged with one count of gross indecency, one count of sexual interference, one count of sexual exploitation and two counts of sexual assault.

Police say the charges date to the 1980s and early 1990s.

Schacter still faces a charge of possessing child pornography, for which he was arrested in December.

Stephen Joseph Schacter

Schacter was a teacher at Eitz Chaim Schools between 1986 and 2004, an office administrator and supply teacher at United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) between 2005 and 2009, and a private tutor from 2009 until 2011.

At a bail hearing last week on the new charges, the judge ordered a publication ban to prevent the identification of witnesses and to preserve Schacter's right to a fair trial.

Bail was set at $10,000. Schacter was released into the custody of his mother. Under the bail conditions, he cannot have contact with minors, among several restrictions. He is permitted to attend synagogue in the company of three adults.

He's scheduled to return to court on March 17. ■

Limmud day of learning catching on in Toronto

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After years of fits and starts, one of the hottest brands in global Jewish education is gaining traction in Toronto with conferences in back-to-back years.

"There's definitely been an appetite," said Alana Kayfetz, co-chair of Limmud Toronto. "Last year's conference whetted the appetite of Torontonians to take ownership and step up to create an authentic, unique Toronto Limmud. It has snowballed a little bit. Last year was a skeletal volunteer team, this year is a very robust volunteer team."

Limmud 2016 will take place March 6 at the Sun Life Financial Tower on King Street West, with capacity for 800 people. Sessions will tackle topics related to Israel, local Jewish ethnography, Bible and Jewish thought.

"You'll see an expansive conversation," Kayfetz said, "ranging from the Jewish response to the Syrian refugee crisis to Jay Michaelson, a global LGBTQ thought leader. We deal with everything. There really isn't a lot that hasn't been upturned. There's something for virtually everyone.

"The challenge we gave to our programming team was that when people make their schedule for the day, they should have a tough time deciding where to go. There should be multiple things that each person will find interesting every hour on the hour."

Alana Kayfetz, co-chair of Limmud Toronto.

Founded in 2004 by U.K.-expat Peter Sevitt, Limmud Toronto was initially slated to run every two years. But after conferences in 2007 and 2009, the event flagged. In 2014, a new leadership team revived it and planned last year's program.

Among the changes this year are enhanced children's programming – "not babysitting," Kayfetz said, but "real Jewish content" – that includes Purim mask-making, team games and a Jewish magic show. Tickets are heavily discounted at $5.

In addition to praise for their programming, Limmuds worldwide have also drawn applause for their grassroots diversity.

"What makes Limmud so special is what happens in the hallways," Kayfetz said. "You could in essence be in riveting programs all day, anything from krav maga to Jewish comedy. But you can also just take a breath of fresh air and engage with someone in the hallway. It's a really unique community-building, networking opportunity."

The roughly 80 Limmuds around the world generally feature a Shabbaton-type atmosphere. Often set outside the city, the multi-day festivals encourage informal bonding alongside scheduled discussions.

Organizers hope Toronto will eventually embrace the idea of a "residential" event where people stay for the weekend. In the meantime, in what they believe is a Limmud first, they've created Limmud Café to fill the void.

"It gives people the opportunity to have a candid conversation with a variety of presenters. For example, Sara Ivry, the editor of Tablet: you could book in a 15-minute coffee date with her, and there could be six other people at the coffee date. It's like unplugged – a very candid conversation with people who have interesting things to talk about."

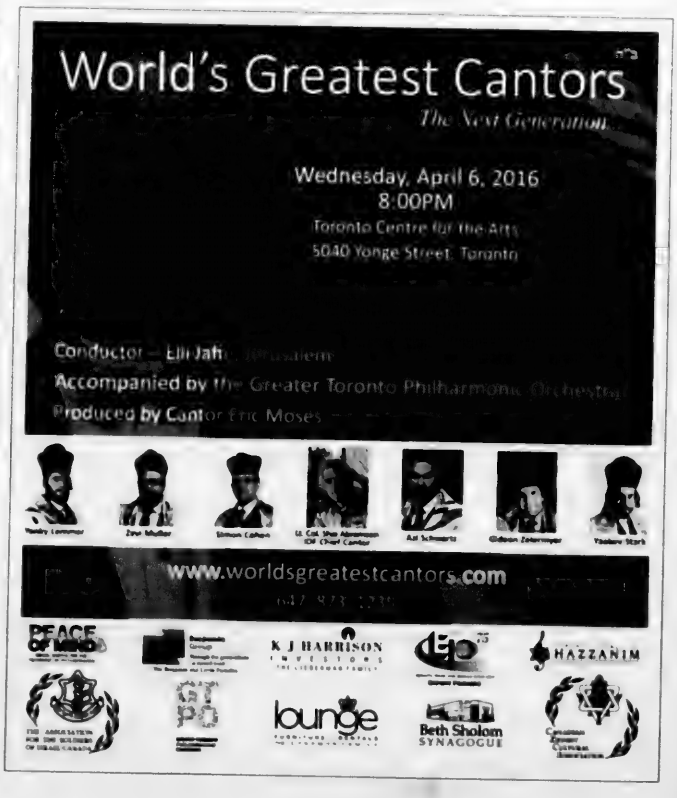
Limmud's diversity does have limits, Kayfetz acknowledged.

"If we had someone in a shtreiml present, we would be totally jazzed about that," she said. "From what I can tell, that's just not the reality. One may argue that at the end of the day, people who are really, really frum might not see anything in Limmud that mattered to them, and perhaps Limmud is more for people who are disengaged with Judaism and haven't really been involved at all, and maybe this is an entryway of outreach on topics that are interesting to anyone."

Still, last year she saw Jews from all denominations, from Reconstructionist to modern Orthodox. "Someone remarked last year that they had never seen so many people with a kippah."

The organization is famed for its do-it-yourself ethos. With no paid staff, its success depends on a core team of around 40 volunteers. Seventy additional volunteer spots are available. "I've never had the opportunity to work with a more diverse group of people," said Kayfetz, who is also director of Genesis, at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Innovation.

"That sort of ingathering of Jews from every walk of life makes it very special, and I think because it's completely volunteer led, there's that level of passion and leadership and dedication that comes from everyday people that you wouldn't normally see." ■



Housing key for people with disabilities, panel agrees

Affordable housing is a key starting point for improving the lives of low-income people and those with disabilities.

That was the key message from six speakers at an affordable housing panel event held Feb. 25 at the Al Green Theatre.

The event was one of many that took place during Toronto's inaugural Jewish Disability Awareness and Inclusion Month, hosted in February by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

The panelists – representing the private, non-profit and government sectors – addressed the current landscape of affordable housing in Toronto, and the challenges and best practices in providing affordable and accessible housing to people who need it.

The discussion was moderated by Alex Bozikovic, architecture critic for the Globe and Mail.

All of the speakers emphasized the need to provide people with disabilities affordable places to live that are modified to meet their needs and integrated into the community.

Rob Cressman, director of social housing for the City of Toronto, said the need for affordable housing in Toronto far outstrips the city's current stock of units.

The municipality has about 94,000 social housing units, but only about 2,000 have been modified to support people with physical disabilities.

"Our wait list for social housing in Toronto is about 95,000 households, and of that, about 600 households are specifically waiting for units modified for wheelchairs," he said.

The city has been working to remedy this, but "we can't do this alone," Cressman said, adding it requires a commitment from all levels of government.

Adam Vaughan, MP for Spadina-Fort York, said Ottawa no longer approaches the issue of affordable housing as a "crisis," but as "the solution."

"Housing is the most effective tool we have to get at a range of challenges all governments face, be it health care, poverty, social marginalization, people with disabilities, aging, refugees," he said.

And while the Liberal government is committed to investing $20 billion in social infrastructure over the next decade, much of which Vaughan said will go to housing, he argued there should be a charter of rights for people with disabilities at the federal level.

The conditions people with physical, developmental and psychiatric disabilities are often forced to live in should be considered a major factor in their overall quality of life, said Jijian Voronka, national peer lead of the At Home/Chez Soi project, a study from the Mental Health Commission of Canada that aimed to determine whether a "housing first" approach – in which people are first provided a place to live, then offered other supports to meet their individual needs – works.

She and her brother became homeless as teenagers, she said, and she feels that acquiring a subsidized housing unit saved her life. Her brother, however, committed suicide at age 21, a tragedy she largely attributes to his poor living conditions in a halfway house.

People with disabilities must be consulted by policymakers, and more effectively, Voronka stressed.

"Now they consult [them] when they already have a road map... laid out... People in power have to learn from people with disabilities, and [the latter] have to understand the knowledge policymakers are sitting on," she said.

> Housing is the most effective tool we have to get at a range of challenges... be it health care, poverty, social marginalization, people with disabilities, aging, refugees

Bryan Keshen is CEO of the non-profit agency Reena, which promotes inclusivity and independence for people with developmental disabilities.

It operates a community residence and purchases units in buildings to accommodate some of its clients with disabilities, but Keshen said the non-profit sector shouldn't be the only one providing this type of housing.

"We tend to be better landlords because we consult people with disabilities. But we don't want to be property managers... We need more options," he said. ■

Status issues can cause uncertainty for children

"I heard, 'Oh, but if your child wants to marry someone who is Orthodox you should be giving them an Orthodox conversion.' I did a lot of soul searching, and I thought, 'I am proudly and comfortably not Orthodox. I will raise my children with respect for Judaism, with the traditions… If it is ever important for them to marry [Orthodox], they can re-convert and go through another process, but I'm going to be true to who I am," she said, adding that her kids identify "very clearly" as Jewish.

For Montreal-based mother Tanya Margolese who has four children – one biological, two step-children and one daughter, 10, who was adopted from an orphanage in Ukraine, the conversion process was nothing more than a formality.

"It was simple because we are modern Orthodox, so basically, we had to have three rabbis. We brought her to the mikvah, they said a few prayers and she is now considered Jewish," Margolese said.

"She went to shul the first week and literally fit in. I can't even explain it. She loved it so much and wanted to be a part of the community so badly that she was. And immediately people took her in and were great with her and with us," she said.

> We need to stop making it so hard for families who adopt older youth to have their children converted

"I found that everyone embraced her from the minute she came home. She also embraced everybody."

For Aviva Zukerman Schure, who has volunteered for the Adoption Council of Ontario and Adopt4Life since she adopted her now 20-year-old daughter about two years ago, the process was a little more complicated.

When her daughter, who is Korean, expressed interest in converting, to "be the same as the rest of [her] family," they moved ahead with the process.

"They wanted her to go to classes, go in front of a board, discuss things. I said, 'My child has already spent her life in front of people making decisions for her and it doesn't matter if we adopted her when she was born or at 18. She's our child. We're not marrying her. So her conversion should be instant in the way that a newborn's is,'" Schure said.

"I think the Jewish community has to catch up when it comes to converting older youth who are adopted… We need to stop making it so hard for families who adopt older youth to have their children converted."

In the end, Schure's daughter went though a Reform conversion, during which she went to a mikvah and made a verbal commitment to honour the values of Judaism.

"Because she's not white… it's one of the reasons we wanted her to have that certificate… No one will ever ask my sons for their certificates of Judaism. It's because she doesn't look like us that I wanted her to have that piece of paper so that no one could ever deny her that right as the child of Jewish parents," she said, adding that her family has only experienced "appreciation and understanding in the community."

Elissa Gamus, a Toronto-based family lawyer, who adopted her son Joseph, 7, from birth and converted him to Judaism through an Orthodox conversion when he was six weeks old, said the process wasn't difficult, but expressed concern about how he'll be accepted in the Jewish community when he's old enough to date.

"Joseph is visibly black, and his personality, like the way he walks, his interest in certain things – he connects both with the Jewish community and with the black community," Gamus said.

She said her son had no issue identifying with the Jewish community "because we're Jewish."

But, she added, "As much as he is welcomed by all his friends… what happens when he gets older and wants to date one of them?" She worries about whether their parents will be accepting of that.

Silverman feels the same uncertainty. "In the Orthodox community, it is not easy in terms of what is accepted and what isn't accepted. Are [her children] marriageable? When you start fixing your kids up, are they less than?" she said. "My son is not married and there are times when someone will talk about a single daughter and I'll stay out of it at this point of my life. I always perceived this, 'Oh, but what's his background? Is he really [Jewish]?'" ■

Orthodox Vaad promotes power of attorney on health care

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Vaad Harabonim of Toronto – the city's Orthodox rabbinic council – is urging members of the community to obtain and sign a power of attorney for personal care and statutory declaration to be used in case they become incapacitated and can't make decisions about their medical care.

The Vaad is distributing a sample document in synagogues and public places frequented by the Orthodox, and is distributing it digitally as well. The council is taking the step because of developments in Canadian law on the issue of assisted suicide and to ensure that Orthodox patients and their families can influence their fates in accordance with Jewish law, said Rabbi Dovid Schochet, a spokesperson for the Vaad.

"There is a change in the law now on assisted suicide," Rabbi Schochet said. "The government needs empty beds in hospitals, and when a person is on life support or critically ill, and there is little chance of surviving, there is pressure to hasten the process."

Rabbi Schochet said the document was distributed recently as a public service to inform the community about their options in cases of severe illness. With the document in hand, families have the right to influence health care providers so that medical treatment does not violate Jewish law.

In addition to containing a blank power of attorney for personal care and statutory declaration, which would give people the right to make medical decisions on behalf of incapacitated family members, it includes a cover letter containing an "urgent message."

Document aims to ensure patients can influence their fates according to Halachah.

The message cites a two-year-old Supreme Court of Canada decision in which the head of critical care at Sunnybrook Hospital in Toronto wanted to disconnect a critically ill patient from life support.

The court ruled the doctors should have applied for permission to do so from the Consent and Capacity Board, a provincial panel appointed under the Health Consent Act.

The board is empowered to "determine what the patient would have chosen themselves, in their present condition, given quality of life, pain, etc.," the Vaad quotes the court as saying.

"Based on the stated desire of some doctors to go ahead and terminate the life of a number of patients in the past few months, the power of attorney…form was prepared."

Rabbi Kalman Ochs of Torah Emeth Jewish Centre said the document was prepared after consulting with doctors, lawyers and others close to the issue. "The document began because there's been a trend in the medical system, in almost all hospitals, that once people are over 80 or are deathly ill, they don't have quality of life, and living is about quality of life, so there's no point prolonging their lives," Rabbi Ochs said.

The document, he continued, "addresses the view of Judaism that life is an eternal, intrinsic value. In Judaism, we value life itself. This [document] conveys to doctors the wish of the Jewish person to preserve their lives."

Besides including a power of attorney form, it includes a blank form allowing the user to appoint a consulting rabbi to assist in the determination of the pertinent Jewish law.

It also includes a statutory declaration in which the individual asserts their "desire that all health care decisions be made for me in accordance with Jewish religious law and custom as determined in accordance with strict Orthodox Jewish interpretation and tradition should any uncertainty arise as to my wishes. I fully subscribe to the values and beliefs of Judaism that every moment of life is of infinite value. I therefore direct that, unless determined by my rabbinic advisor that such actions would be contrary to Jewish law, my life be prolonged for as long as possible by any means medically available."

In its message to the community, the Vaad notes that even if the document is completed, it "brings no guarantees. It must be stressed that the Supreme Court decision is dangerous to our principle of preserving life and has taken you and your families' right to decide on end of life issues out of your hands. This document, even at its best, can only serve as a means of influencing the Consent and Capacity Board to understand how you would decide, if you could, with regard to termination of your life. As such, it cannot guarantee the result you would want to see, but it is the best that can be done in this onerous environment." ■

On Gaza seaport, Israel navigates between Egypt and Hamas

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

The co-ordinator of the Israeli government's activities in the Palestinian territories, Maj.-Gen. Yoav Mordechai, was quoted at length last weekend saying that there have been no talks over the establishment of a seaport for Gaza.

In comments quoted by the Saudi-linked news site Elaph, Mordechai said that should such negotiations take place in the future, they would be conducted only vis-à-vis the Palestinian Authority (PA) – not the Hamas rulers of Gaza.

It was a surprising statement, in light of the positive approach among some Israeli ministers, along with members of the IDF's top brass, to the idea of such a seaport.

And it's likely that the statement was directed not at Israel or Gaza, but Egypt.

The Times of Israel has learned that Israeli officials are still speaking favourably of the seaport idea, even after Cairo demanded that Jerusalem issue clarifications about its détente talks with Turkey and the option of establishing a port for Gaza in Cyprus or on an artificial island.

It's no secret that the Egyptian government is vehemently opposed to the establishment of a seaport to serve the Gaza Strip so long as Hamas, which is allied with its enemy the Muslim Brotherhood, remains in power. The Egyptians led the opposition to the removal of the blockade on Gaza in the wake of the war there in the summer of 2014, and Cairo has been consistently opposed to opening the Rafah crossing between the Strip and Egypt's Sinai to Palestinian travellers.

Egypt's demands are unequivocal: Rafah will be open only once control of the border crossings is handed over to the PA. The Egyptians apply the same principle to the idea of a seaport, which they will only countenance if the PA, not Hamas, governs the passage of goods into the Strip.

Amid reports regarding the option of putting Gaza's port on an artificial island or in Cyprus, Egypt held talks on the matter with the PA, which is also opposed to such a move.

In the wake of those talks, Cairo signalled to Jerusalem its opposition to establishing a seaport anywhere while Hamas is still in control of the Strip.

Mordechai recently met with commanders of the PA security forces, according to Palestinian media. It's certainly possible that the issue of the seaport came up in that meeting.

Azzam al-Ahmad, one of the leaders of the Palestinian Fatah party, made the PA's opposition to the establishment of a seaport clear last Friday Feb. 26, asserting that Ramallah could stymie any such initiative.

Meanwhile, Hamas' leaders have been waxing combative about Gaza's need for a seaport while at the same time signalling that they have no desire for another round of hostilities with Israel.

"The Strip needs and wants a seaport, and that issue has also been conveyed to the Turks – their siege on Gaza will not be lifted without the establishment of a seaport," senior Hamas official Khalil al-Hayya said Feb. 26.

Another of the group's top officials told the pan-Arab newspaper Al-Hayat last week that there has been significant progress in talks between Turkey and Israel, especially regarding the option of erecting a seaport.

Analysts in Gaza told The Times of Israel that they are under the impression Hamas has been trying to inspire hope for real change among the residents of the impoverished enclave.

However, they warned, if Hamas fails to deliver on its promises, pressure will mount on it to take action, even if that means more war. ■

Israeli envoy to Egypt says shoe-throwing won't deter him

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Haim Koren, the Israeli ambassador to Cairo whose recent meeting with an Egyptian lawmaker sparked a shoe-throwing protest in parliament on Feb. 28 says the incident has not deterred him from strengthening bilateral relations between the two countries.

"I meet with [Egyptian President Abdel-Fattah] Sissi and members of his government regularly," Koren told Israel's Channel 10 television last Sunday evening. "Both countries have a shared interest in fighting terror organizations like the Islamic State and Hamas."

Koren went on to tell the TV station that bilateral meetings between Israeli and Egyptian officials aimed at strengthening relations between the two countries would proceed, despite the scuffle in parliament earlier in the day.

"I can say that relations with Egypt are very good," Koren added.

Egypt has full diplomatic relations with Israel, but directly dealing with the Jewish state remains deeply taboo in Egyptian society.

Egyptian MP Tawfiq Okasha has been engulfed in controversy after posting a picture on the embassy's Facebook page of him with Koren last week, Egypt's state-run news agency said. Koren and Okasha reportedly discussed politics, trade and agricultural co-operation between Israel and Egypt.

On Feb. 28, an urgent parliamentary session convened to investigate Okasha's meeting, during which MP Kamel Ahmed hurled his shoe at Okasha in protest, the MENA agency reported.

But Ahmed was not the only legislator outraged by the consultation. During Sunday's session, one MP called the initiative "political prostitution," while another hundred members of the legislature called for an emergency session to discuss the meeting.

Okasha, Ahmed said, "deserves 90 million shoes," according to a translation of his remarks by the Hebrew-language Ynet news website. "I want to shoot him. What I did reflects the nation's opinion. I did what I did because I am an MP and a representative of the people. Every time I see him, I'll hit him with a shoe."

Okasha swung back at critics, saying he extended the invitation to Koren in hopes of recruiting Israel to help mediate Egypt's dispute with Ethiopia over the latter's Grand Renaissance Dam, a project Cairo fears will limit its share of Nile River water, the Egyptian Independent reported.

He cited the 1979 peace treaty signed between Israel and Egypt, and expressed hope Israel could play a constructive role in settling the ongoing dispute, the report said.

Official relations between Jerusalem and Cairo have been relatively warm since Sissi became president of Egypt in July 2013.

In the unrest that followed the ouster of the previous president, the Islamist Mohammed Morsi, Israel reduced the number of its diplomatic staff posted to Cairo. However, it began building up its presence in the city more recently in light of the relative calm. In September 2015, Israel reopened its embassy in Egypt after being shuttered for four years.

In February, Egypt's new ambassador to Israel, Hazem Khairat, hailed the increased bilateral relations, expressing hope that the two countries' "constructive" relationship would bring peace to the region.

Khairat is Cairo's first senior emissary to Israel since 2012. ■

OPINION

OK God, now it's Your turn!

Sagi Melamed

"Sagi, are you sitting down?" my friend Yael asked when I called her to touch base. After several years in a senior Israel-Diaspora position, Yael had decided it was time to seek new challenges.

This is Yael's inspiring story:

"I left my job and decided to give myself a year to search for a new job, think and explore options. I spent quality time with my family and friends, as well as with myself. I met scores of people, consulted head-hunters, went to interviews and received job offers. But none felt 'right' or excited me. I refused to compromise and kept searching.

"Then one day I suddenly realized what I wanted to do. I sat down with my husband in our kitchen, and over a cup of coffee, I told him, 'I've got it! I want to do – matchmaking!'

"He smiled and said, 'Why not? Go for it! But what exactly are you going to do and how will you make a living from this?'

"'I'm not sure, but that's what I want to do.'

"Having received my spouse's blessing, I had a personal discussion with the Creator. 'God,' I said, 'I've done my part. I examined, I searched, and I discovered how I can add my modest contribution to make Your world a little better. Now it's Your turn!'

"Less than one week later, a "wanted" ad on Facebook caught my attention: 'Seeking CEO for Hiburim – an organization that helps people find their match.' My eyes lit up and I sent them my resume. The next day, I got an email inviting me for an interview. But there was a catch: they warned me that the salary was low.

"At first I thought I would simply delete the email and continue searching, because I wasn't willing to work without appropriate compensation. Then I said to myself, 'Yael, God answered your request immediately, and you're going to just delete the answer?'

"So I went to the interview. From there on, things moved quickly – the chemistry was right, we wanted the same thing, we reached a fair compromise on the salary, and today I manage a groundbreaking new matchmaking enterprise."

Yael's story is inspiring. Although our prayers are not always answered so promptly and completely, belief is supremely important when seeking work and career, as I know from the "The Next Step" initiative run in my community, Hoshaya.

I founded The Next Step about 18 months ago, together with a team of volunteers from Hoshaya, who have a variety of critical skill sets in employment: in industry, employment law, human resources, pensions, etc. When a member of Hoshaya is searching for a job, being laid off, considering a career change, or facing another employment-related challenge, the team helps with legal advice, resume-writing, networking, interview training, presentation skills, and so on.

I have learned that beyond the priceless skills, education and training, faith is the determining factor in searching for a job and identifying "the next step."

What do I mean by "faith"?

Faith in oneself – that one has the skills, energy and commitment to bring value to one's next employer, and that the match is in both your interests.

Faith in the path – even if you meet obstacles, frustrations and disappointments on the way, at the end of the path is the right job with the right organization.

Faith that everything is for the best – that even if you receive a negative answer from what you thought was your dream job, it is still for the best – when one window closes, another door opens.

And last, but not least – like Yael, faith in a higher power. The faith that if you do your part, God will do God's part. As it says in Grace After Meals: "I was young and now I am old, yet I have never seen a righteous man abandoned nor his offspring begging for bread." ■

William Glied was only 13 years old when he was deported, along with his parents and sister, from his home in Subotica, Serbia to Auschwitz-Birkenau in April 1944. A year later, after being transferred to Dachau to work as a slave labourer, he was liberated by the U.S. Army.

He was the only member of his family to survive.

Glied, who came to Canada as an orphan in 1947, was in the German town of Detmold earlier this month for the trial of 94-year-old Reinhold Hanning, a former Nazi SS guard. Hanning, who served in Auschwitz from January 1943 to June, 1944 is accused of being an accessory to the murder of at least 170,000 people.

Glied is one of three Canadian Holocaust survivors who testified as civil parties on the context of Hanning's crimes, alongside Max Eisen, also of Toronto, and Judith Kalman of Montreal. Approximately 40 survivors or their relatives have joined the trial as co-plaintiffs.

Glied, Kalman and Eisen also testified at the April 2015 trial of the "Bookkeeper of Auschwitz" Oskar Groening, convicted of being an accessory to the murder of at least 300,000 Jews.

Before the trial of former Nazi guard John Demjanjuk, trying such guards was an arduous task for German prosecutors, as they had to prove they were directly responsible for a victim's death. Demjanjuk's conviction set a new precedent in 2011, however, allowing members of staff who worked in concentration camps to be tried as accessories to murder, even if they did not directly kill their victims.

For Glied, 85, the precedent is significant, as it demands those who contributed to the mass genocide of Jews and other minorities during the Holocaust to finally be held accountable, some 70 years later.

"I feel that there can be no time limit in prosecuting those who committed such horrible crimes during the Holocaust," Glied told The CJN from Detmold. "While I feel some compassion for Hanning because of his age and health, the world must know about these unspeakable crimes, not only from the few survivors who remain, but from the monsters who committed them. It will forever remain a black mark on the postwar German government that only some 50 SS guards were convicted from the 8,600 who served in Auschwitz-Birkenau."

> I feel that there can be no time limit in prosecuting those who committed such horrible crimes during the Holocaust

Efraim Zuroff, head Nazi hunter at the Simon Wiesenthal Center, told the Associated Press that there's no question there were "some serious failures by the German judicial system in the past," but "that doesn't in any way change the validity of what's happening now."

"In a certain sense, you could say these people had the bad luck to live a long life," he said from Jerusalem. "If they had died five years ago, they would never have been going to trial."

Hanning allegedly guarded Jews during the "selection process" at Auschwitz, jurors were told, where some were sent for labour and others to the gas chambers. During the period in which he served, the bloodiest in the camp's history, less than 25 per cent of its inmates were chosen for work. Hanning's attorney, Johannes Salmen, says that his client admits to serving at the Auschwitz I section of the camp, but denies serving at the Auschwitz II-Birkenau section, where the majority of the camp's victims were murdered.

According to Nazi hunter Thomas Walther, who served as both Eisen's and Glied's attorney, the trial is the first time "in history" that an indictment speaks about an accused being involved in the organized mass genocide at Auschwitz as a crime of murder.

"I hope to prove that everybody who worked at Auschwitz, this place of real hell on earth, is guilty of being an accessory to murder," he told The CJN. "No special duty was necessary. Working at Auschwitz is the absolute border that nobody should pass. Auschwitz was the one place on earth where even participation was enough. Participation in anything there means 'guilty.'"

Despite Hanning's age and the time lapse between his crimes and now, Glied said his trial is important, because it can teach a younger generation about the Shoah. "There are a lot of people in this world who still claim that the Holocaust never happened," he said. "The conviction of as many of the perpetrators as possible will surely disprove these terrible lies."

For Glied, the path to atonement is through education. "We must never forget the six million of us lost in the Shoah," he says. "We must be vigilant and stamp out falsehoods such as those proclaimed by the Iranian government, and we must work toward having Holocaust studies included in every Canadian school's curriculum."

Hanning's case is one of approximately 30 involving former Auschwitz guards currently under investigation by German prosecutors. Two other cases are also likely to go to trial this year: a 93-year-old woman charged with 260,000 counts of being an accessory to murder, and a 94-year-old man who reportedly served as a guard.

"All members of the SS were assigned the task to make mass murder possible," Walther said. "Altogether, Auschwitz was a place with only this one specific purpose in mind." ■

New exhibit focuses on architect Benjamin Brown

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"Location, location, location," they say, are the three most important things in real estate. If so, the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) has scored a wonderful coup by securing the Urbanspace Gallery in the majestic loft building at 401 Richmond St. W. as the venue for an exhibition in homage to Jewish architect Benjamin Brown.

Some three decades after former OJA director Stephen Speisman secured a large collection of Brown's aging architectural drawings and blueprints, current OJA director Dara Solomon has raised $75,000 to restore Brown's crumbling paper legacy and to mount this happy exhibition in situ along the Spadina garment district corridor where Brown's bricks-and-mortar legacy is most evident.

Just around the corner from the gallery, for example, is the Balfour Building, arguably one of Brown's most important commissions, which, along with his Tower Building across the street, is considered an architectural "gateway" to the garment district. Built for the Shiffer-Hillman clothing company and completed in 1930, the Balfour Building amply demonstrates Brown's superlative sense of scale and proportion – as cited by several experts in an eight-minute looping video that accompanies the show.

Toronto's first accredited Jewish architect, Brown graduated from the architectural school at the University of Toronto in 1913. Excluded from the WASP-ish old-boys' network of architects that then prevailed, he attained commissions from a circle of wealthy Jewish businessmen – with names like Gelber, Dunkelman, Cherry, Greisman and Pomerantz – who became his champions. His career reached its zenith in the 1930s. Most conversant in art deco and art nouveau styles, he also utilized more traditional elements from Georgian, Gothic, Tudor, Romanesque and other styles.

"One of the major goals of the exhibition is to position Benjamin Brown as an important early architect in Toronto," Solomon said. "He built so many buildings all around the city that are still standing, yet little is known about him. He's not in the history books."

Benjamin Brown: Architect highlights many landmark structures, from his addition to the Hermant Building in Dundas Square (soon to be plaqued by Heritage Toronto) to the St. George Street home of Mendel Granatstein (no longer standing). Besides the grand loft buildings that accommodated both factories and showrooms, he designed numerous Jewish communal buildings of note, including the Primrose Club on Willcocks Street (now the U of T's Faculty Club); the former Beth Jacob Synagogue on Henry Street (now a church) and the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah.

He also crafted many residences for wealthy Jewish patrons as well as more mundane stores, commercial structures and warehouses. He was so prolific that dozens of dots – a veritable blizzard of them – mark his various projects on a large city map designed for the show by artist Daniel Rotsztain. His work presents a tidy cross section of where Jewish Torontonians lived, worked, learned, worshipped and played.

Visitors to Benjamin Brown, Architect would do well to stroll around the neighbourhood beforehand or afterwards to view the various local examples of his work, including the seven-storey New Textile Building built for the Gelber Brothers at 205 Richmond St. W. These familiar structures still brilliantly hold their own amidst the forest of much higher buildings that have sprung up all around, and help the district retain its historic character and definition.

Before departing this once vibrantly Jewish neighbourhood in which Yiddish was the primary language spoken on the street, you may wish to visit the thriving What A Bagel restaurant on the west side of Spadina near Adelaide. How nice to nosh on a freshly baked bagel on Spadina once again, as in the storied days of old. ■

Two Jewish literary awards provide more opportunities

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Norman and Lillian Glowinsky

Helen and Stan Vine

> We're really delighted that there's so much support and opportunity out there for Canadian Jewish writers

Fourteen months after declaring that the venerable Canadian Jewish Book Awards would go on a year-long hiatus, the Koffler Centre of the Arts announced last week the formation of a "prestigious" and far more lucrative apparatus for literary prizes, the Vine Awards for Canadian Jewish Literature.

The previous awards featured nine to 12 categories that only occasionally were attached to monetary prizes, usually $500 to $1,000. By comparison, the Vine Awards will hand out four $10,000 awards each year in the categories of fiction, non-fiction, history and young adult/children's literature, with an additional fifth prize worth $10,000 bestowed every three years for poetry.

Benefactors Lillian and Norman Glowinsky have generously committed $100,000 annually for the awards, which were named in honour of Lillian's parents, Helen and Stan Vine. What doesn't flow out in prizes will be used for administration, according to Koffler literary director Natalie Kertes.

Whereas the awards ceremony was previously open to all, the Vine Awards will be a more exclusive and glitzy Giller-type affair meant to generate media attention and book sales, Kertes said.

"It won't be a big public gala. It will be a more intimate evening involving the press, the writers and their publishers, and other stakeholders. It will be a much smaller event than it used to be. We're looking to really engage the press, and we want to do something targeted at them. We want to make sure that these books get the attention they deserve."

The Koffler Centre has indicated it will make up for the skipped year by accepting submissions published in both 2014 and 2015. It will also consider digital publications for the first time. (It has yet to name its intended three jurors, but they will certainly have their work cut out for them, since they will likely have to read dozens of submissions in a matter of months.)

Submission deadline is June 3, and a short list of winners will be announced in August 2016. The gala event will likely be held in September in a venue that's yet to be determined.

No longer is the book awards ceremony anchored to the annual Toronto Jewish Book Fair as it was in recent years. Instead, the Koffler is planning a Vine Awards reading series featuring the award-winners and "other writers in the Canadian Jewish canon," Kertes said.

Remarkably, with the arrival of the newly constituted Vine Awards, there are now two sets of annual Jewish book awards being given out in Canada, at least for the time being. That's because, despite Koffler's announced hiatus, half of the juror pool decided to stage the awards independently last year. Nine book prizes were awarded at a well-attended public ceremony of the Canadian Jewish Literary Awards at York University last fall, very much in keeping with the tradition that the late Adam Fuerstenberg founded about 1988.

Hosted by York's Jewish studies program, the Canadian Jewish Literary Awards is inviting submissions in nine categories this year and has scheduled its awards ceremony for October.

"They sort of sprung out of our hiatus," Kertes said, acknowledging that no attempt at consultation or co-ordination with the renegade group was made in planning the Vine Awards. "They wanted to stick with a more traditional program, and we're doing something very different than what they're doing... We're really delighted that there's so much support and opportunity out there for Canadian Jewish writers."

Writers and publishers should be thrilled by the largesse of the Vine Awards, which would certainly help to shine the media spotlight on winning titles.

On the other hand, with two independent Canadian Jewish book awards currently in operation, the cost of submitting books for consideration has doubled. It costs $40 to enter a title in each of the Vine Awards and the Canadian Jewish Literary Awards, and each requires five hard copies of titles being submitted. ■

An imaginative, moving portrait of King David

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

David – the shepherd, psalmist-poet, musician, warrior and king – is one of the most complex figures in biblical history. The Bible chronicles his life in unsparing detail of both praise and censure. We are introduced to David in Samuel 1, Chapter 16. His death is abruptly yet poignantly recorded 41 chapters later in the second chapter of Kings 1.

The extent and particularity of the record in the biblical recounting of David's story attests to the man's pre-eminence not only for every generation of Jews that has lived since the canonization of the Bible, but, through the Messiah theology, for the very unfolding of western civilization as well.

Through 3,000 years of displacement, exile, wandering and powerlessness, the Jewish People looked back with rhapsody and longing to King David. Indeed, during those same years, we also looked forward with prayer and hope to the wondrous day when a descendant of his would arise to heal the fractures of the world and bring peace, finally, to the Jewish People.

King David's story is rich in drama and spectacle, a veritable magnet attracting the imaginations of countless artists, each one striving to add to the robust detail of the Bible.

The most recent artist to reimagine the life of the poet-warrior-king is the Pulitzer Prize-winning Geraldine Brooks. Brooks brings her prodigious skills as an experienced journalist, foreign correspondent and masterful writer of historical fiction to the task.

The Secret Chord is bold and brazen, creative and adventurous, at times tender and always affecting. Brooks remarkably recreates the feel and the sense of life – always precarious – around the year 1000 BCE in the land of Israel. The Hebrew tribes often contended among themselves even as they attempted to stave off the marauding ways of the powerhouse Philistines who ruled the coastal plain along the Mediterranean.

For example, Brooks fleshes out with gritty and graphic detail many of the battles mentioned in the Bible. Whereas the biblical account of the death of David's son Absalom is a curt narrative statement of fact that we quickly travel across and note sadly in our minds, Brooks' account is expanded, arresting and grim. It is impossible not to stop and reflect upon its full import.

With the striking array of colours in the biblical story as her base, Brooks' deep artist's palette paints a captivating, moving landscape of vivid characters. Part of Brooks' success is in her use of the prophet Nathan as the narrator. His perceptions

The Secret Chord
by Geraldine Brooks

are the brush that fills in the canvas of David's life. He provides the reader with an episodic history of David's life. Thus we read, mostly in flashback, of the key events in David's life as told in the Bible with elaborate, embellished detail that springs from the questing mind and well-researched files of the author.

This can be seen after David conquers the city of Yevus, makes it the capital of a united country and accompanies the procession of the Holy Ark into the city's precincts.

The scene is described in Samuel II (JPS 1999 traditional version): "David whirled with all his might before the Lord; David was girt with a linen ephod. Thus David and all the House of Israel brought up the Ark of the Lord with shouts and with blasts of the horn."

With stylish sweeping of her writer's brush, Brooks considerably enhances the biblical description. A short excerpt from the three pages she wrote of the bringing of the Ark to the City of David conveys the breadth of her abilities.

"Soon, the procession was in the valley, the curtain that shielded the Ark rippling in the warm wind… David, standing just in front of me, could not keep still. He held his arms out from his sides, his fingers stretching down to the earth, quivering as if some great energy were passing up and through them. He was breathing fast and deep. Suddenly, he raised his chin and gave a cry – like a paean, but higher, sweeter – rich notes that filled every heart with gladness. Then he was loping down the hill, as wild as a boy, as ardent as a lover, sprinting toward the Ark. When he reached it, he cast himself down in full prostration, his arms stretched out as if in the widest embrace. It was a lover's moment, between him and the Name, the great One who had blessed him, kept him and brought him to this moment. I knew how he prayed: I had felt its ardency. Now all his people felt it. I could hear the sighs and the cries all around me as the power of it moved and stirred the crowd. When David rose to his feet, he did so as if lifted by strong and tender arms. Then he began to dance."

As the above passage also shows in the italicized words how Brooks telescopes biblical or liturgical quotations throughout the book. Here she foreshadows the fuller text of the traditional blessing of gratitude.

Because of its many openly sensual passages and speculative, revealing portraits of biblically revered individuals, the book may offend individuals who read this portion of the Bible literally. But for readers who view their faith as an expression also of collective memory, of shared history, Brooks' imagined portrait of King David would be intriguing as well as moving.

Brooks acknowledges that the book's title, The Secret Chord, is a tip of the hat to Leonard Cohen's line in his wildly popular and powerful song Hallelujah. The astute reader will also notice an additional reference from Cohen's song when David tries to explain to Nathan how he felt when he first saw Bathsheba bathing on the roof. "There was something about the moonlight on her shoulders, the tumble of her hair… I tell you Nathan, for all your iron discipline – even you would have been overthrown."

Very effectively, Brooks closes the story with a delicate, moving reference to "one sustained, sublime, entirely glorious chord" that we assume accompanies David's final moment on earth – a secret chord no longer, but shared with us for eternity. ■

At 95, menswear retailer almost ready to retire

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Samuel's Clothing store on Queen Street West in 1942 and Sam Warner

After almost three-quarters of a century in the men's clothing business in Toronto, Sam Warner wants to retire.

The 95-year-old Warner still exudes his love of the retail men's clothing business, but says at his age, with some trouble walking and seeing, "it is time to move on.

"But I can't retire yet because I still have an inventory of men's clothing that I have in my home and I have to sell."

As a young child, Warner, one of six children, had polio, which left him with muscle atrophy. He nevertheless went on to ride a bicycle, and he played baseball and tennis until two years ago.

As a child living through the Depression, Warner sold newspapers. He attended Harbord Collegiate, graduating in 1938. In 1942, after working in a hat factory for four years and saving $800, he decided to open his own menswear business.

His first store, located at 225 Queen St. W., was known as Samuel's Clothing. After moving to a few different locations on Queen Street, he changed the name of the business to Hollywood Clothing Jobbers.

"The area went from a dump with dirty bookstores and bookies everywhere to a trendy street," Warner said.

When the property was sold, he took in a partner and moved to John Street, near the Art Gallery of Ontario. When his partner retired eight years ago, Warner closed the business, giving part of the stock to charity and moving the rest to his home.

Warner continued to go on buying trips and said he still gives his personal service to his customers.

In an interview with The CJN, the articulate nonagenarian looked back to the war years when new merchandise was difficult to obtain, as it was directed to the armed forces. For the duration of the war, his business sold second-hand merchandise, he said.

"After the war, we could purchase new merchandise, and I was able to buy out special deals."

With joie de vivre, Warner recalled many of the colourful events that happened in his business, such as the time three men came into his store and bought clothing. "I later found out that they were prisoners of war and had escaped."

He also told of an obese man who ordered a suit and came back and bought 135 suits. His clientele included, among others, lawyers and government officials, and he provided costumes for many theatrical productions.

"About half of my clientele today are haredim from Lakewood, N.J., who come for black suits and designer white shirts."

He has supported a synagogue and charities in Cuba and travelled to Cuba annually for many years

Warner has three children, 12 grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren. He was accompanied to the interview by his daughter, Ellen Warner, an oncologist at Sunnybrook Hospital.

"Probably, one of the most important things my father taught me," his daughter said, "is just because everyone believes something, it doesn't mean it is correct. Therefore, I'm a researcher and I do not take things at face value. I look at how people are being treated and find out how we can improve what we are doing.

"My father is passionate about social justice and he is the least materialistic person I know. He is totally unselfish and he has always been devoted to his family, his customers and the world." ■

Want to eat kosher in Vancouver? No problem

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

If you're a kosher visitor to Vancouver, there's an excellent chance you won't starve or lose weight – unless you're climbing Grouse Mountain or repeatedly jogging around Stanley Park between meals.

The good news is you have five choices for eating out in a kosher environment, a selection of restaurants that ranges from delis to ultra-casual cafes with one semi-fine dining eatery thrown into the mix. Several of them sell food you can take with you, such as frozen Israeli prepared foods, complete frozen meals, smoked and other cold meats, hummus and dry foods. Here's the lowdown on where to go for good kosher grub.

Sabra Glatt Kosher Restaurant & Bakery: Simon Kahlon, a Libyan Jew who speaks fluent Italian and learned to bake in Israel in 1968, opened shop on Oak Street in 1993, starting with a deli and adding a modest restaurant soon after. It seats 40, serving shwarma, falafel, bagels, sandwiches, salads, knishes, burgers and wholesome Jewish baked goods, including challahs.

There's a special menu for kosher Chinese food if you're feeling so inclined, and a pizza oven where chalav yisrael pizza is baked to-go – everything under the halachic supervision of BC Kosher.

The restaurant serves meat and pareve dishes made fresh in the restaurant kitchen – "no preservatives whatsoever," Kahlon says proudly.

If you're from Toronto you might know one of the two Bali Laffa locations there, owned by Pini Kahlon, Simon's son.

Omnitsky Kosher Deli is further south on Oak Street, a delicatessen serving salads and smoked meats, with a small sit-down restaurant that accommodates 26 for breakfast, lunch and dinner. Efrem Rappaport, fondly known as "Eppy" to Vancouverites, was studying sociology in Manitoba when William Omnitsky approached him with the opportunity to buy the deli. At 25 he became the owner, moved to Vancouver ("it was a younger, more vibrant community," he says) and opened up shop.

"I'm told my smoked meats are way better than anywhere else," says Eppy, who taught himself how to smoke meats and has a full processing facility on Annacis Island from which he supplies wholesale kosher food to grocery stores, prisons, airlines and hospitals.

The day we stopped in, it had noodle salad, pickled beets, potato salad, chopped liver, fried rice and ready-to-go wings behind the deli counter.

With Omnitskys' move from Cambie to Oak Street 18 months ago, the restaurant menu has tripled in size. Offerings today include hamburgers, knishes, tossed salads, hot dogs, soups and egg dishes for breakfast. Meals run from $2.95 for a basic hot dog (extra if you want to add Winnipeg chili to the order!) to $14.95 for a pastrami sandwich or roast beef au jus.

Nava is the café at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and a natural gathering point for hungry locals scrambling between kid pickups, fitness classes and brief social get-togethers. This cozy dairy/pareve eatery belongs to Suzy Siegel, a Mexican Jew who arrived in Vancouver via Israel in 1991 and has long been one of the city's most beloved caterers.

"We're all about comfort food here, food as simple and as homemade as possible," she says, gesturing at the wraps, yogurt parfaits, sushi and vegetarian chili behind the glass display case.

The day we visited, the tofu teriyaki salad ($7.50) looked fabulous, as did the beet salad. There's lots of quintessential West Coast fare at Nava's: Cajun salmon burgers, sushi, muesli seed cookies and curried lentil soup that took the chill right out of a cold winter's day. Siegel and her team, headed by chef Eran Rozen, feed a few hundred people a day and cater for meals ranging from one or two for Shabbat up to several hundred for weddings.

Shuk Eat + Play is the newest player on the city's kosher restaurant scene, headed by Alon Volodarsky and chef Evy Swissa. Located on Oak and 41st streets, Shuk offers borekas, labneh, chatzilim, shakshuka, Moroccan fish and fabulous house-made hummus.

The "play" portion of the eatery's name comes from the large seating space in the back of the house where there's play equipment that will keep kids from six months through four years old busy long enough for their parents to eat the food they ordered. Shuk gets my vote for attention to detail, with lots of little extras. For example, my shakshuka ($14.50) arrived on a skillet, presented on a wooden board accompanied by French fries in a neat stainless steel basket. It was served with hummus and Israeli-style pita. Swissa's za'atar focaccia looked wonderful, and other diners I chatted with raved about the Persian fish balls and the flatbread with caramelized onion, goat cheese and pesto. If you have a sweet tooth, try the tahini ice cream for dessert. You're unlikely to find it anywhere else in the city.

Maple Grill is the closest you'll get to kosher fine dining in Vancouver. Open weekdays for dinner only, its entrees are more sophisticated dishes such as flame-grilled lamb chops ($36), honey-miso glazed sablefish ($29) and slow-braised beef brisket ($29).

If you're on a tighter budget, there are a few more casual plates, including chicken burgers, steak or salmon sandwiches and soups and salads.

Inside, the restaurant feels dressier (though there's no dress code – this is, after all, Vancouver, where jeans, sneakers and a North Face jacket are always appropriate). There are no white tablecloths, but there's no deli case for take-out either. So if you're in the mood for a more formal kosher dining experience, this is the place. The only place. ■

Who knows what you learned last summer?

Chaimie and Leizer

Every winter, the Yiddish students of the world look forward to the summer when, let loose from the dreary halls of academe, they can roam the globe studying the mamaloshen. Thankfully, the Yiddish academic blog InGeveb has done the legwork to compile a list for said students and Yiddish seekers that aggregates some of the best the globe has to offer.

These include Yiddishkayt's Helix Program in eastern Europe, the Uriel Weinreich Summer Program in New York City, and the Ot Azoy! Summer Yiddish Program in London, among many global others. But, being ever the pessimistic ones in perpetual YidLife Crisis, and truly in the business of the real pleasure in life, which clearly is avoiding painful experiences (again, YOU'RE WELCOME), we did the research to find the worst or most questionable Yiddish programs on the planet. Again, this is just what we do, and we must repeat, that there is no need to thank us. (But we're not saying a card wouldn't be nice…)

1. For those who crave grim-but-historically-accurate, full-bodied experiences, Ukraine's "Yiddish Summer in Darkness" program offers an immersion in Yiddish in the sewers of Lemberg (today, L'viv).

The program is appropriate for all levels. Some discomfort mandatory. Rickets optional. Program lasts from two months to two years (whenever the Red Army arrives and ends the program).

2. YiddishPharma is your traditional Yiddish pharmaceutical summer program, traditional in that you must dress modestly in the clean room. Students work to produce high-grade pharmaceuticals and are required to pay for the privilege. Special courses offered in inflationary drug pricing.

Basic knowledge of organic chemistry preferred. Housing: corrugated tin hovel (tin optional). Tuition: $7,999 (exclusive of transportation).

3. Under the slogan "We bring the Magic Mountain to Moyshe," this summer program in the High Tatras combines a number of successful models of Yiddish summer programming: European travel, bucolic landscapes, incomprehensible teachers and severe bodily distress. Join the inmates of Medem Sanatorium 2016 for a not-so-restful stay in a classic consumption sanatorium. Sing traditional anarchist songs, have daily sputum checks, mourn your non-existent childhood.

Disclaimer: risk of contracting tuberculosis from other students is more likely than recovery. Tuition: $1,400 (but, to be fair, BYOW – bring your own wine).

> We did the research to find the worst or most questionable Yiddish programs on the planet.

4. So many books, so little space. Spend this summer helping create green solutions in Yiddish book waste management. Ever wonder what happens to the volumes of Yiddish books that are too worn out or mouldy for reading? Join a cadre of Yiddish students to find out on the Shredder Yiddish Summer.

Appropriate for all levels. Non-disclosure agreements must be signed and notarized before the start date.

5. Given the success of Yiddish programs housing participants in yurts in barren wildernesses, it's no surprise there are students who want to go off the grid with a wandering band of spiritual seekers. This year's trip looks at the collective history of Jews who fled to Central Asia and lived alongside various nomadic groups in rural Kazakhstan.

Must read and write using 1930s Soviet Yiddish orthography. Some experience in sheep pasturing is a plus, as is the mastery of fretless lute-like instruments.

6. "A fiddler on the roof, sounds crazy, no?" No, not at all actually. A team of architects, ethnomusicologists, and acrobats take students throughout Poland to play music on rooftops throughout the land.

Perfect for all Yiddish students who wish to combine their love of traditional Jewish ornamentation in architecture and music. Good sense of balance an asset. Good sense of music a strong asset. Anatevkan roots strongly preferred.

In all seriousness (or let's at least say more seriousness), there really are all sorts of Yiddish classes, in the fleish and on the veb, that can allow you to refine your skills in the Yiddish language and immerse you in Yiddish culture. You just have to have the curiosity and the drive to go out and find them. ■

Chaimie and Leizer are Jamie Elman and Eli Batalion, co-creators of the world's first online Yiddish sitcom YidLife Crisis.

Mother's Day – as I see it

Lauren Kramer

The Mother's Day ads will be out soon, and every year they make my stomach turn.

"I don't need a Mother's Day present, so please don't get me one," I tell my kids. And honestly, I don't. Unless it's handmade, a letter or card they've created themselves and carefully written. We don't head out for lavish Mother's Day brunches, and if there's one day of the year I really don't want flowers or chocolates, it's Mother's Day. Valentine's Day would be a very close second.

What I really despise is the commercialization of the concept of Mother's Day, the extent to which it's been turned into a spending spree where a mother's value is measured in how much you spend on her, from the meal out to the kinds of gifts she's supposed to receive. Does your mother inspire you? Then shower her with expensive jewelry, we're told. Buy her chocolates. Treat her to a meal out. Spend, spend, spend. If you don't, the subtext reads, you really don't love her all that much.

My Mother's Day sentiments are strongly aligned with those of Anna Jarvis, a West Virginian who founded the concept back in 1908 and campaigned to make it a recognized holiday in the United States. She was on a mission to honour her own mother, who had cared for wounded Civil War soldiers before she died in 1905. Backed by John Wanamaker and H.J. Heinz, Jarvis wrote letters and launched promotional campaigns. By 1914, she had her way. That year, U.S. President Woodrow Wilson signed a proclamation creating Mother's Day as a national holiday to honour mothers on the second Sunday in May.

For Jarvis, things went south from there. Shops, florists and restaurants recognized an opportunity for profit, and Hallmark Cards and its industry rivals were selling Mother's Day cards by the early 1920s.

Embittered by this exploitation of her pure intentions, Jarvis even tried to rescind the concept she'd worked so hard to create. It was supposed to be about sentiment, not profit, she protested. She'd wanted people to show appreciation, love and gratitude for their mothers by writing personal letters by hand, not buying gifts and pre-made cards. Fighter that she was, Jarvis refused to go down quietly. She organized boycotts and threatened lawsuits, trying to stop the commercialization. In 1923, she crashed a candymakers convention in Philadelphia, and in 1925, she was arrested for disturbing the peace when she protested at a confab of the American War Mothers, which raised money by selling carnations.

I agree wholeheartedly with Jarvis, who declared that purchased greeting cards were "maudlin, insincere, meaning nothing except that you're too lazy to write to the woman who has done more for you than anyone else in the world." My protest against Mother's Day is on a much smaller scale than hers, however.

I protest by resisting purchased cards, rejecting anything but a handmade gift, and doing my best to boycott restaurants on Mother's Day. When the second Sunday in May rolls around, I ask my family for just two things that I don't usually receive. One is a day without sibling rivalry, just one full day when I don't have to mitigate arguments between my children. The other is that I get to choose how we spend time together that day.

In years past, we've done hikes in the rainforest or a family bike ride to the river, with a picnic on the banks. My spouse will make dinner that night, putting in more effort than usual to prepare the foods I like – which means we won't get plates of omelets or processed food. And if I'm lucky, I'll get a handwritten card from my kids, one that fills my heart with love and makes me feel I'm doing something right in this world. That, for me, is the ultimate Mother's Day. I think it's one Anna Jarvis would applaud, too. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains how some mitzvot help us build a better Jewish community
Rabbi Denise Handlarski considers the relationship between communal space and communal identity
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says we can't consider ourselves complete unless we are prepared to unite with all Jews

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

I suppose I shouldn't have been surprised when a student recently told me, "I know, being Jewish is just being a good person and being kind to others." I've heard this statement many times, and it is supported by commandments such as respecting parents, taking care of those less fortunate, etc.

Of course, the young student sought to feel validated, in that the universal lessons she learns from school and society are backed by the Torah.

Yet, how do we explain this week's parshah –Vayakhel – with laws about Shabbat and serving God? Can these mitzvot, too, make us better people?

The parshah begins with Moses gathering the entire community. First, he gives them the laws of Shabbat, and then he gives them the laws about contributing to the building of the Tabernacle. The sense of community seems important here.

Recently, I participated in two "siyum" initiatives. A siyum is a ceremony that marks the completion of a Torah text, either by individuals or a group of people. One siyum marked the completion of the Book of Psalms by a group of friends, as an expression of support for a mutual friend; the other was the completion of the entire Talmud by women around the world, as an expression of pride in advanced women's Torah study.

What struck me as the essential component of each siyum was the sense of community it created. We needed each other to complete the task. What brought meaning and motivation to the experience was the knowledge that by studying a text in my own home, I was spiritually and intellectually connecting with a community of learners.

In many places, the mitzvot of the Torah teach us to be kind. At the same time, there are mitzvot – like for Shabbat and the Tabernacle – that serve to create a space of communal worship and engagement, which ultimately serves to strengthen every part of our personal and religious lives. ■

What is the relationship between communal space and communal identity? Parshat Vayakhel is completely concerned with setting up the Tabernacle and readying the priests as the previous chapters have outlined. The details, when one reads the parshah, can be overwhelming.

What I like to notice, however, is not so much the details about what must be included, but rather the communal sense of building something together. The people must come together to contribute to the Tabernacle's construction. In doing so, they both create the place that will help solidify them as a people, and solidify themselves as a people by co-creating their sacred place.

The Tabernacle is meant to be set up with great precision, including being adorned with jewels, gems and other things. Artists contribute what they can, women contribute their weaving, and what is really being constructed and woven together is community through space.

Another detail in the parshah that excites me is that Moses has to tell the people to stop giving, so enthusiastic are they in their contributions. To me, this captures the spirit of Jewish generosity. When we are at our best, we are a people who really rally around what is needed. Someone needs a place for Shabbat or a Pesach seder? We have room at our tables. Someone needs donations of clothing or food? Our families and communities hear the call.

I love the idea that every time there was a need for donations or contributions, we gave and gave until we had to be asked to stop. Our communal spaces help define us as communities. But much more important are our communal acts of generosity and kindness. We as Jews know how to create and give in ways that are both affirming and beautiful. ■

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

This week's parshah begins with the words "Vayakhel Moshe," (Moses gathered them). These are the things that God commanded, "to do them."

The words, "to do them" appear superfluous. "Vayakhel" indicates that Moses made a "convention" of the Jewish People. God commands Moses to ensure that the resolutions at this "convention" bring practical results.

In the portion, we read that both men and women participated in the construction of materials for the Temple. Yet two individuals were singled out: Bezalel from the tribe of Judah, and Oholiav from the tribe of Dan. The tribe of Judah was considered the leader. The tribe of Dan, on the other hand, was the last tribe to travel in the desert. These two individuals represent two extreme opposites of our people. By choosing them, the Torah teaches us that all Jews, regardless of their knowledge or observance, have an equal share in the Temple. God says, "I need every single Jew to be involved."

This Shabbat is also Parshat Shkalim. Every Jew donated a half a shekel to pay for the daily sacrifices. It's an unusual mitzvah, where the rich must not give more and the poor no less than half a shekel. Why not give a whole shekel? The answer is that the rich man's half-shekel together with the poor man's half-shekel make one complete shekel.

One lesson we learn is that no Jews can consider themselves complete unless they are prepared to unite with another Jew.

The four mitzvot of Purim also emphasize unity. We give foods to our friends. We give charity to the poor, uniting rich and poor. We read the Megillah in a group. We eat a festive meal with our family and as many people as possible. In the merit of unity, may we see Mashiach in our days!

Happy Purim! ■

Universities host Middle East Week

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Dean Peachey

While Israel Apartheid Week may still be alive and well on many North American campuses, in Winnipeg, the anti-Israel program has barely had a pulse for several years now, thanks to proactive efforts by the University of Winnipeg and Winnipeg Hillel.

For the past three years, U of W and Hillel at both U of W and the University of Manitoba have been countering Israel Apartheid Week with Middle East Week at U of W – Feb. 22 to 26 this year – and Jewish Awareness Week at U of M, organized by Hillel in mid-March.

In addition, at both U of W and U of M, Israel Week on Campus in early February featured Israeli prizes, interesting facts about Israel, information about study and volunteer opportunities in Israel and Birthright trips, as well as a fundraiser for Save A Child's Heart, which raised over $750 for the Israel-based charity. Half the students attending were not Jewish.

Hillel also held an interfaith Shabbat program, with invitations extended to a variety of student groups to strengthen relationships between Jews, Christians and Muslims on campus.

At U of W, the turning point came six years ago when then-president and vice-chancellor Lloyd Axworthy originated Middle East Week to bring people together for respectful discussion of Israeli-Arab and Israeli-Muslim issues.

"With Middle East Week, we try to focus on the Middle East in general rather than just Israel and the Palestinians," said Dean Peachey, executive director of U of W's Global College and co-ordinator of its human rights and global studies program. "This year, we are focusing on Syria and Iraq as well as Israel and Palestine."

Middle East Week 2016 kicked off Feb. 22 with a talk by W. Rory Dickson from U of W's department of religion and culture, speaking about ISIS and its relationship to Islam. Later in the day, journalist Gwynne Dyer spoke on "Don't Panic: Islamic State, Terrorism and the Middle East."

On Feb. 24, Adam Muller, a genocide researcher at U of M, and Winnipeg Yazidi activist Nafiya Naso spoke about the genocide of the Yazidi people.

The last two programs were Israel-Palestine centred. On Feb. 25, Israeli-Arab author and journalist Sayed Kashua spoke on "The Arabs in Israel: The Inaudible Cry for Full Citizenship," about the challenges of being an Arab in Israel. Kashua, who recently immigrated to the United States, is a humourist who created and wrote the hit Israeli TV show Arab Labor.

The final event was scheduled to be the controversial play My Name is Rachel Corrie, to be staged Feb. 26, followed by a panel with playwright and U of W theatre professor Hope McIntyre, film producer Saira Rahman and lawyer Corey Shefman, who is also associated with the Manitoba Association for Rights and Liberties.

Rachel Corrie was a young American volunteer for the anti-Israel International Student Movement who went to Gaza in 2003 and lay down in front of a bulldozer to try to prevent an Arab house from being demolished. She was run over and killed, and became a martyr to the anti-Israel cause.

Peachey said the play is "something a lot of students can identify with: an idealistic young woman who wants to make the world a better place and ends up in Gaza not knowing much about the situation and in over her head." He said the panel would focus on "using drama and art to address social and political issues." ■

Kashrut supervision called 'crux of the matter'

Diena agreed. "For whatever reasons, whether COR convinced the CFO or it did it on its own, the CFO's position is that if you want to get this quota, you have to have COR," he said.

Neither group had COR on board at the start. Diena had arranged for certification by MK, a Montreal-based agency recognized internationally. Kraman brought on board a group of prominent Toronto rabbis associated with the Vaad Harabonim, but who provided hashgacha under Agudas Shomrei Hadas, a kashrut agency created in 1947.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, executive director of MK, stated, "In a free market, companies request kosher certification from various kosher certifying agencies and the company has a choice as to which certifying agency they wish to turn to for their kosher certification. There is no exclusivity for any one agency operating in a specific jurisdiction, with regards to certifying a manufacturer."

In response to queries from The CJN, COR and MK issued a joint statement that said, in part, "The MK and COR work closely together and rely upon one another in a myriad of different settings."

Going back before the CFO's request for proposal two years ago, the Diena group conceived of a novel solution. It approached two First Nation's bands and discussed with each placing a plant on their land, thus bypassing provincial regulations but opening a constitutional and jurisdictional Pandora's box.

The Dienas backed off that proposal when a representative of the Ministry of Agriculture suggested working through existing channels. (The ministry did not respond to CJN questions prior to deadline.)

The Dienas then teamed with an organic chicken producer and looked to MK to provide kosher supervision. They considered going with COR, but "COR wanted a lot more money than MK," Diena said.

"We wanted COR to be part of it, but in the end our major hechsher [certification] would have been MK, with COR attached," he added.

Kraman thinks the group he assembled had the best bid: they had an existing plant lined up that was already in use to produce organic chickens (later he switched to a larger halal plant). In addition, Charles Weinberg, former owner of Chai Poultry, agreed to come on board as a consultant and the group had arranged $10 million in financing.

Kraman believes the bid failed for two reasons: the CFO board, which consists of people involved in the industry, was not keen to see a group get such a sizeable allotment at their expense. That created a disincentive for the CFO in awarding a new allotment, Kraman suggested.

And kashrut supervision "was the crux of the matter." ■

Next week: Are we getting any closer to Ontario-sourced kosher chickens?

Aharon Ariel Lavi creates Jewish intentional communities

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Aharon Ariel Lavi, who will be in Toronto on March 6 as part of the Limmud Toronto programing, is an Israeli "serial social entrepreneur" and an established community development professional, who believes that networks are the key to shaping the next generation of Jewish community life in Israel and the Diaspora. He is founder of Garin Shuva – a "Jewish eco-mission-driven community" on the Gaza border, upon which the organization Hakhel – Jewish Intentional Communities is based. He spoke to The CJN about the organization, which he sees as a new method for engaging millennials and young families in Jewish life.

When did the concept of Jewish intentional communities, or urban kibbutzim, start gaining ground?

About 25 years ago, this started from the kibbutzim who realized that the kibbutzim are not relevant anymore, so they started urban kibbutzim. They'd move into a neighbourhood, buy a whole street, or a few houses, and start a kibbutz, where, instead of doing farming and agriculture, they started doing education and social projects and stuff like that. Then came the religious Zionists, then came the Ethiopians… All kinds of sub-sectors of Israeli society started producing what we call "intentional communities," meaning these are not only communities that you live in and have your own happy life, but as a community, you also do something for its larger surrounding.

In Shuva, where I live, it is a village that has about 80 or 90 households. It's a small place. And our team of young people who moved in is not only helping the place demographically. We also started educational projects, formal education for the entire area. We started a new school, a new kindergarten. Other teams in other parts of the country have projects for anything from community gardens to employment to social businesses – it depends on the specific areas they are living in.

A Jewish intentional community has three components: group, life and mission. Group means that it has some sort of internal culture and discourse – like, you do holidays together, you learn together, you create social bonds that keep the group together.

Life means that this is a lifelong project. We deal with people who are older – in their 20s, early 30s – who have young families who are willing to settle down and do something for the long term.

The third component is mission, which is that the community as a group is doing something for the larger society. It can be education, welfare or social benefits.

There is a way of managing shared life and we know how to do it. Not 100 per cent. We're still people. There is a saying in Israel, in the professional community-building world, that the toughest part or the worst part about communities is the people. That's a big problem, dealing with human beings in a community.

Are there communities like these in Toronto or other big cities in North America?

I was living in New York City two years ago. I was there for one year as a fellow for the Tikvah Fund fellowship program. I had a conversation with a UJA federation head in New York and I was telling him about what we do in Israel, and he said, 'Why don't you write us a proposal and we'll see if we can do something like this in America?'

We just started Hakhel a couple of years ago, and we are basically inventing this concept of Jewish intentional community in America, so in the United States now, we have 10 communities officially in the program. There are a few more that are not officially in the program, so I would count 15. Those communities are in California, Colorado, New York City, Washington, D.C., etc.

Aharon Ariel Lavi

In Toronto, there are some early beginnings. There is a small interested group around the Kiever Shul downtown. There are a few things going on. There is a conversation about doing this in Canada, but we still haven't done it.

How can the Hakhel concept benefit North America Jewry?

The second most important thing in sustaining Jewish identity after a nuclear family, the thing that ties you to something bigger than yourself, to a nation, to a religion, to something that is beyond yourself, is your community.

The problem, as far as I see it in North America, is with the younger generation – I'm 33, I'm an older millennial. One of the things that characterizes millenials is that we don't buy into the traditional hierarchical structures for the most part. For the most part, millenials don't find themselves in those big synagogues with the president and a board and Jewish politics.

Those institutions were great in their time and for the Jewish people in the '50s, '60s, '70s, and after the '90s, but history moves on – it's not good or bad, it's just that things change. People change, culture changes, so here's the problem. If, on the one hand, we know that communities are one of the key components in keeping young Jews connected to their identity, to Jewish peoplehood and all that, but on the other hand, the existing communities don't resonate with them anymore, we need to come up with a sort of new model for the community that will resonate with millennials and young people.

Are Jewish intentional communities the answer to the issue of millennials being disconnected from traditional Jewish community life?

It's an answer. I wouldn't go so far to say that this is the answer, because I might have lots of enemies after saying that. But I think it is a key part of the answer. From the age of zero to 22, Jewish institutions have everything in place. They have Jewish kindergartens, day schools, Jewish organizations on campus, and Chabad houses.

There is an assumption that if you invest in a boy or girl from the age of zero to 22, hundreds of thousands of dollars per person, by the time they're 32, 10 years later, they'll get married and join the Jewish institutions, the shuls you have in place and that is it, problem solved. The problem is that it is not solved. There is a lost decade between 22 and 32 and they may not come back.

I don't see a huge wave of aliyah from North America in the foreseeable future. Jews in North America want to stay there for the moment. Anything can change at any moment, but as far as we can see, the vast majority of millions of Jews who live in Canada and the United States are going to stay there.

With this project, Hakhel, besides the benefit of having these communities in North America, which are great in and of themselves, there is an added value of connecting emerging Jewish community leaders in North America with emerging Jewish community leaders in Israel. ■

My three epiphanic inoculations

Backstory

ELI HONIG

I imagine that most people have some epiphanies during their lifetime wherein they gain insight into something that may have been illusive prior to their sudden realization of its truth, or even its existence. Perhaps it was a newfound understanding of a commonplace event. On occasion, it may even have had the effect of inoculating them against the malady of taking themselves too seriously. It may also have made them wary of cultural or religious distortions of various kinds.

The first epiphanic inoculation I can remember occurred in the 1950s when I was about 12 years old. I was an elementary school student at the Lubavitch Yeshiva on Park Avenue in Montreal. I must have been a very impressionable and naive kid, because the principal, Rabbi Feiglestock, called me into his office one day and said: "Eli. Don't be fooled by a beard and payes [side locks]."

It was remarkable. Here was a man with a long beard and long payes wrapped around his ears warning me not to be taken in by these trappings. He continued: "Everyone in Europe had a beard and payes. Even the gonif [thief]." And then he asked me: "Do you know what the gonif did?" I must have stood there amazed because I have no recollection of answering. "The gonif took his tallit and tfillin [phylacteries] to shul in the morning, after which he would go home and eat breakfast. Then he would ply his trade! Later in the day he would return to shul to daven Minchah and Ma'ariv [afternoon and evening prayers]. If there was still time in the evening, he would continue to ply his trade." And then Rabbi Feiglestock repeated to me: "Everyone in Europe had a beard and payes."

To this day, I don't know what I said or did that prompted him to protect a young boy against possible charlatans. Whatever it was, I am grateful for the warning not to be fooled by outer trappings. It was a profound lesson and a lifelong inoculation. More than 60 years later, I am still grateful for it.

My next epiphanic inoculation occurred a few years later when I was in Baron Byng High School, also in Montreal. In those days, the school was populated overwhelmingly by Jewish kids, reflecting the nature of the surrounding neighbourhood.

> Here was a man with a long beard and long payes wrapped around his ears warning me not to be taken in by these trappings.

One day, our teacher, Mr. Zweig, asked us a series of amusing questions. The question that stumped us completely was "What's a phoodnik?" When none of us could answer, he said: "A noodnik with a PhD."

Somehow this observation stuck with me, so that years later when I received my doctorate, I wasn't too impressed with it, or with me. As I matured, that episode served as a cautionary note that a title does not necessarily mean a person is a deserving human being. Indeed, of the 15 attendees of the Wannsee conference in 1942, where the Nazis' Final Solution was hammered out, eight had the title "Dr."

My third epiphanic inoculation took place many years later when I was reading a book about the Brzozow community, a small town in southeast Poland, where in their youth my parents and extended family lived. In this haunting book, I found the following anecdote that my late uncle, Isaac Roth, related. He had survived some 10 camps during the war, and he had a deep and lasting influence on me.

As a child, Isaac used to walk with his grandfather, Rabbi Shalom Gabel, the Rav of Brzowzow, to the "Klojze" [shul]. "The rabbi would start the prayers in his house and he would finish the silent prayer of Shmoneh Esrei before all the other worshippers. The grandson asked his grandfather the reason for conducting the prayers in such a hurry... His reply was, 'My dear child, the Jewish People need parnassah [to make a living] and we should not hold them back even for one unnecessary minute.'"

These words have resonated with me ever since I first came upon them. To be a recipient of such a sensitive inheritance is something that I will always cherish. ■

for CANADIAN JEWISH LITERATURE

The Koffler Centre of the Arts is proud to announce the VINE AWARDS FOR CANADIAN JEWISH LITERATURE, a significant new literary prize in Canada made possible by the Lillian and Norman Glowinsky Family Foundation.

The Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards – administrated for over twenty years by the Koffler Centre of the Arts – has been relaunched as the prestigious Vine Awards for Canadian Jewish Literature.

The newly branded prize will honour the best Jewish Canadian writing in five categories, each with a prize of $10,000: Fiction, Non-Fiction, History, Young Adult/Children's Literature and Poetry. Submission deadline: June 3, 2016.

The Vine Awards for Canadian Jewish Literature is made possible by a generous donation from the Lillian and Norman Glowinsky Family Foundation to support Canadian Jewish literature, a tradition they established with the original awards in 2004, building on the founding of the Canadian Jewish Book Awards in 1988 by Adam Fuerstenberg. The Vine Awards are a loving tribute to Lillian's parents – Helen and Stan Vine – who were passionate about the arts and the Jewish community throughout their lives.

Jacob sheep set to make aliyah, and are the flu's days numbered?

Rare breed heading to Golan

An Israeli couple living in Abbotsford, B.C., are hoping to return a rare breed of sheep to Israel that the patriarch Jacob is believed to have raised, but is now extinct in the Holy Land. Jenna and Gil Lewinsky, both 31, are raising a flock of 130 Jacob sheep and want to bring them to the Golan. Red tape had held up the process, which began last year, because Canada wasn't on the Israeli Agricultural Ministry's list of approved sheep importers. The couple – she a former Israeli bureaucrat and he an ex-journalist – asked the Israeli Embassy to intervene. Ambassador Rafael Barak got involved, and the ministry contacted its Canadian counterpart last week to hasten the sheep aliyah. The flock is expected to reach Israel this year.

The Israeli Embassy agreed it wasn't a baaaaad idea to help rams like this make aliyah.

Israeli firm patents universal flu vaccine

Is the flu about to be wiped out once and for all? Ron Babecoff, CEO and founder of the Israeli firm BiondVax, which has patented a vaccine with potential to fight every strain of flu – including deadly ones like bird and swine flu – thinks so. The company, based in Weizmann Science Park in Ness Ziona, is in late Phase 2 clinical trials and recently announced that Israel's National Authority for Technological Innovation will fund up to 40 per cent of the $920,000 (US) needed for ongoing development of the vaccine. The research is being led by former Weizmann Institute scientist Tamar Ben-Yedidia.

Holy Land transgender beauty pageant

Israel will soon be holding its first beauty pageant for transgender women. Nearly 30 transgender Jews and Arabs auditioned March 3 at a Tel Aviv club for a place in the Miss Trans Israel contest. "Definitely we are achieving, enlightening the people to accept and empower transsexuals," pageant organizer Israela Stephanie Lev told the Associated Press. Finalists will compete at a pageant in May, and the winner will represent Israel at the Miss Trans Star International pageant in Spain in August. Elian Nesiel, a 20-year-old contestant, said she believes that being transgender is "gradually accepted more and more... it's a process, like everything." ■

Debating Noa

I learned that JNF Canada cancelled its support of an Israel Independence Day event because Achinoam Nini (Noa) was invited to perform at the event. ("Embassy to support Noa concert after JNF pulls support," March 3). I have no doubt that Nini is one of Israel's best singers, and I very much enjoy her concerts and her singing.

This event is different. Nini herself boycotted an event at which right-wing singer Ariel Zilber received an award for his lifetime work and also requested that her membership in the Israeli Union of Performing Artists be cancelled.

Personally, I am against boycotts in general and prefer to relate to every topic on its own merits. However, I must respond to Nini's boycott of Zilber.

It is important to note that I do not agree with many of Zilber's statements, some of which are reprehensible. At the same time, Nini's extremist statements are no less outrageous, and some are even more so! Even so, I am ready to fight in favour of their right to express them – yes, both of them.

In my opinion, by her behaviour, Nini delegitimizes herself as a performer at events whose goal is to connect the People of Israel to the State of Israel.

I believe that every person and every opinion should be respected, and that political opinions should not be mixed with art, something Nini has yet to learn.

We must all oppose boycotts and threats, from both right and left, and we must continue to further KKL-JNF's original goals, which are to act on behalf of the unity of the Jewish People and the awareness that the Zionist ideal is our banner, and that all of us should aspire to peace, brotherhood and unity.

Hernan Felman, KKL-JNF deputy chairman
Israel

The readiness of the Israeli Embassy to step forward and sponsor Vancouver's Yom Ha'atzmaut concert after the abrupt withdrawal of JNF over the participation of singer Achinoam Nini illustrates an enduring distinction in Israel-Diaspora relations.

The tolerance of diverse opinions about complex issues affecting the Jewish state tends to be greater in Israel than among many major Diaspora communities. Nini's views certainly rest on the far left end of Israel's political spectrum. But whereas the JNF and its local machers in Vancouver denounce such views as supportive of efforts to delegitimize the Jewish state, Noa's supporters in Israel recognize them as reflective of the acceptable current debate among Israelis about their country's future.

Liberal party's new path

As Canadian Jewry wonders how different Canada's approach to Israel will be now that the Liberal party has replaced Stephen Harper's Conservatives, a good indicator of that is the anti-BDS motion brought by the Tories. ("Anti-BDS motion supported by Liberal, Tory MPs," Feb. 25).

Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion reluctantly supported the motion, and it is worth noting that the leader of the NDP and his caucus voted against the motion. It is clear that the Liberals have a long way to go in achieving the degree of support for Israel that was demonstrated by the Conservatives.

Secular Jews

Religious practice, the most overt marker of our identity, helps keep religious Jews together. But nothing can be done for other Jews, according to letter writer Jerry Paskowitz (Feb. 25), who believes that those who "abandon" the "primary tenets of our religion" cannot remain Jewish.

The word "abandon" suggests that being secular instead of religious is a choice. It is not. I am secular because I am unable to believe, not because I choose not to.

I am sure that with or without secular Jews, the Jewish People will survive. But without secular Jews, it will live on as the relic of some quaint ancient religion, like Yazidis, Zoroastrians or Taoists. Fortunately, it won't happen, because secular Jews identify as Jews, and need no one's blessing to call themselves that. I am a Jew. To the core. It may be hard to explain, but there it is.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Tolerating differences among Jews

Rabbis must address the denigration of other forms of Judaism and speak up against intra-Jewish disparagement whenever they hear it

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: I've just returned from England, where I had the pleasure of being the scholar-in-residence at a leading Reform synagogue.

My hosts, lay leaders in the synagogue, are very involved with progressive Judaism in Europe and worldwide. One of the topics of our conversation was the negativity expressed by more traditional Jews against more liberal ones. This is expressed in a wide range of contexts – anything from Orthodox rabbis refusing to stand beside non-Orthodox rabbis at official events to court battles to keep progressive synagogues from state recognition (which is very important in Europe), to disparaging remarks made at dinner parties.

Here is my question, posed with respect: why does it seem to be so difficult for those in the traditional camp to understand different ways of being Jewish? And why does it so often feel like open season on liberal Jews, even from those whose affiliation may be Orthodox, but whose practice is anything but?

My own feeling is that if someone is Jewishly connected, that's a positive for the Jewish People as a whole. If there were only one form of Judaism – yours or mine – there are many people who would fall away from Jewish life entirely. For that reason, among others, I am adamant about not speaking badly about other denominations, and I don't tolerate negative remarks against other Jews, but I'm not sure that practice is shared.

Rabbi Korobkin: It's important to distinguish between two things that you've conflated. One is the unwillingness of some Orthodox rabbis to work with Reform rabbis on an institutional level. The other is interaction and acceptance of individual Jews as kinfolk between the Reform and Orthodox communities.

Do haters and xenophobes exist? Of course. If you're looking for them, they can be found in both "camps." But by and large, I have not encountered the insults and disparagements of Reform Jews that you speak of within the Orthodox world. If anything, there is a desire among most Orthodox Jews who seek to engage those outside their immediate community and to be genuinely tolerant of others' expressions of Judaism while at the same time not shying away from their own pride in their Orthodoxy.

When it comes to institutional recognition of Reform Judaism – not Jews – that is a different kettle of fish. Some rabbis fear that giving recognition to Reform clergy also lends credence to their religious and/or theological positions, including Reform's attitude to Halachah, which is untenable for Orthodoxy.

But I have rarely, if ever, heard an Orthodox rabbi insulting Reform Judaism from the pulpit. For most Orthodox rabbis, that battle was fought long ago – it's water under the bridge.

Rabbi Grushcow: I find your response heartening, but I'm not entirely sure how to square it with the insults lobbed against Reform Jews that we hear from Israeli Orthodoxy on a regular basis. Perhaps this is simply a product of what happens when religion gets mixed with politics.

But I wonder: do Orthodox rabbis address the bad-mouthing of non-Orthodox Jews that goes on among congregants? I know it's not a one-way street, but I also know that I consistently try to speak up against any intra-Jewish disparagement when I hear it. I'm fortunate to have good colleagues across denominations here in Montreal, and I'm confident we stand up for each other. But how might we better address the denigration of other forms of Judaism that goes on outside the walls of the synagogue?

Rabbi Korobkin: True, there's always the occasional quote from a religious political figure in Israel bashing Reform Judaism. It makes for a titillating headline, but I just shake my head in dismay. Any invective among Jews is counterproductive, to say the least, and is reflective of the disunity that has prevented our redemption to date.

But in the end, I would offer you the same fatherly advice that I offer anyone facing bullies: don't let the bully's intimidation daunt you or diminish your efforts. Instead of insulting back, prove the bullies wrong. Show the naysayers that your Judaism is sincere, holy, consistent and fully committed. ■

From Yoni's Desk

My three shuls

For years now, synagogues have struggled with the most basic of questions: how to get people – especially younger ones and those with growing families – to show up. Across North America, shul membership numbers are in near-continuous decline, and even with rabbis and lay leaders trying just about everything they can to bring new people in, or former attendees back, nothing seems to be working. The fact is, more and more Jews can't find a shul to call home.

Which makes it odd, perhaps, that I call not one, but three synagogues home.

The first is the shul of my youth, where I grew up, made friends for life and learned valuable lessons about shared responsibility. It hasn't had an official rabbi for decades now, and virtually all of the work it takes to keep a mid-sized minyan running – from leading prayers and learning programs, to managing finances, to preparing the weekly newsletter, to organizing the kiddush – is done on a rotating, volunteer basis. A lot of things about my childhood shul have changed over the years, but that central ethos hasn't, and when I show up once every five or six weeks on a Shabbat morning, I can't help but marvel at the collective spirit that still permeates the place.

The second is the shul of my present, a large synagogue with a team of rabbis on staff, a solid kiddush and a well-stocked daycare (which is where, if we're being honest, I spend almost the entire service). Put it all together, and the sheer scope of programs and facilities ensures that my kids are routinely both asleep five minutes into the walk home. There are other shuls within closer walking distance, but none offer such a robust, reliable synagogue experience for my family and me, and so, even in the dead of winter, I still prefer the 35-minute walk (with a double stroller) to more local options. The destination makes it all worth it.

The third is the shul of my future, a modern, mostly young community of like-minded people trying to break barriers by combining an egalitarian spirit with the traditional Orthodox prayer service. It meets only once a month – for now, at least – in the common room of a condominium tower, and if 50 people show up, that's a success. But just about everyone who davens there feels like they are building something, and many of them are discovering a shul they can be comfortable in for the first time. The question is whether this fledgling group will ever be able to take the next step and become a fully formed synagogue-community. It's not a given, especially in this age, but they're doing their best to make it happen, and that's a win in and of itself.

I guess I'm lucky to feel comfortable in three different synagogues. I certainly recognize that my experience is the exception rather than the rule. But if my three shuls offer a unifying lesson, it's that there are an abundance of synagogue options out there. And it's a real shame that so many people are unable to find even one they can honestly call home. ■ — YONI

OBITUARY

Woman of valour will be sorely missed by all

Victor Goldberg

Since her passing on Feb. 15, many glowing and well-deserved tributes have been written and spoken about the remarkable life and achievements of Constance Glube, better known to her friends as "Connie." This outstanding woman was a trailblazer who, notwithstanding her gender and ethnicity, rose through the legal ranks, shattered the glass ceiling and ultimately was appointed chief justice of Nova Scotia. While our professional paths frequently crossed during her time on the bench, my most precious memories stem from the other areas where our lives intersected.

Originally from Ottawa, she married into the Glube family of Halifax. The Glubes had a very close and long-standing relationship with the Goldberg family. Both were founding members of the Shaar Shalom Synagogue and very active in all aspects of the Jewish community, not least of which was an abiding love of and support for Israel. Connie had a staunch commitment to the egalitarianism of the Shaar Shalom congregation and regularly attended and participated in Shabbat services, always sitting in the same spot and next to the same people.

In the mid-'90s, my wife and I had the pleasure of participating with the Glubes in an Atlantic Canadian mission to Prague and Israel. During our visit to Jerusalem, we had a tour of the Supreme Court followed by a private meeting with one of the court's female jurists. I vividly recall Connie's joy and pride bearing firsthand witness to the deep and abiding commitment of the Jewish state to the rule of law and importance of the judiciary as a bulwark of democracy.

While Connie's late husband, Dick, was an avid sailor who once sailed a yacht across the Atlantic Ocean, she was a keen bridge player, a hobby and passion that we shared. Connie approached the game as she did all other aspects of her life. She combined exceptional ability and competitive zeal with a pleasant and unflappable demeanour and achieved great success at all levels of tournament competition. Although her ability to dedicate time to the game took a backseat to her career, she resumed competitive bridge after retirement without losing any of her mental acuity or love of the game.

Constance 'Connie' Glube was a trailblazer and a true mensch.

Deeply committed to her community, religion and the administration of justice, Connie was above all a devoted wife, mother, grandmother and great-grandmother. She took great pride in all of her family's many accomplishments and was a steadfast rock and support in times of adversity. She believed in the importance of giving back, both in terms of time and resources.

From 2007 to 2009 she was chair of the Queen Elizabeth II Hospital Foundation, which is the fundraising wing of the main hospital network in Halifax, and helped recruit me to the board, where I had the pleasure of serving with her for some years. She was a significant contributor to the UJA campaign and any number of other causes. Her philanthropy epitomized the way she lived – generosity at a leadership level without pretension. To canvass her was a delight. She would thank me for taking the time to solicit for such a worthy cause. She had no air of self-importance and made it clear that it was the cause that was important.

Needless to say, Connie's view of justice transcended the practice and dispensing of the law. She held a steadfast belief in the importance of human dignity and the protection of basic rights. When the Asper family approached people from across the country to support their vision of building a Canadian Human Rights Museum in Winnipeg, it was Connie who helped solicit donations in Nova Scotia and became a founding member of the Human Rights Museum board.

Notwithstanding all of her achievements and awards, she was always approachable, honest, respectful, funny and, above all, a loyal and caring friend. Her husband enjoyed working with friends on building and maintaining miniature but working trains, one of which was kept in their home. Even though he had passed away almost 20 years ago, Connie continued to entertain his surviving "railroaders" on a weekly basis, and always left them cookies and cakes to enjoy during their working visits to her home. Such was the nature of this extraordinary human being whose real legacy may be how one can achieve great professional success while at the same time balancing career with family, friends, leisure activities and community involvement.

Who was this woman of valour whose many accomplishments were due to intelligence, ambition and hard work but always tempered with even-handedness and humility? Connie can best be described by drawing on expressions from her twin passions of bridge and Judaism. She was a true "life master" and "mensch," and she will be sorely missed by all. ■

How to respond to abuse in Jewish schools

Criminologist GUILA BENCHIMOL explains what the community and its institutions must do in the wake of recent charges and allegations

In the last few weeks, two men currently and formerly living in Toronto's Jewish community have been arrested and charged with crimes of a sexual nature.

Stephen Joseph Schacter, who taught at Eitz Chaim Schools between 1986 and 2004 as well as at United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) from 2004 to 2006, was charged with one count of gross indecency, one count of sexual interference, one count of sexual exploitation and two counts of sexual assault. This follows upon his arrest in December 2015, when he was charged with possession of child pornography.

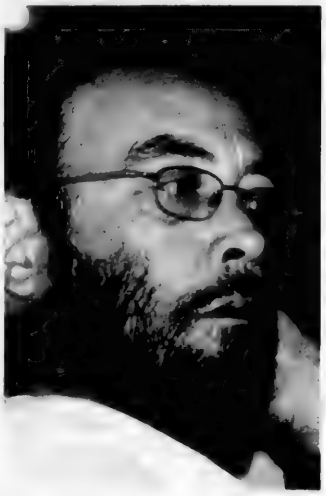
Meanwhile, David Prashker, the former director of Leo Baeck School, was arrested in California in February and charged with possession and distribution of child pornography. In 2008, Prashker resigned from Leo Baeck after it was discovered that he had authored violent and sexually explicit poetry and posted it online.

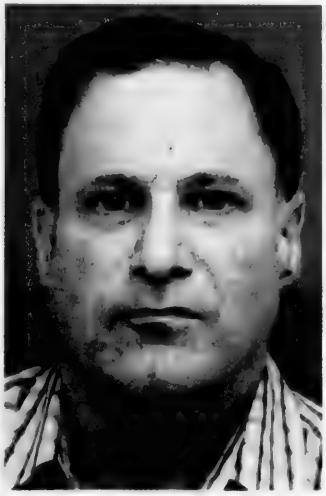
These two individuals have worked with minors in the Jewish community. And yet, there has not been a community-wide response to these charges and allegations thus far.

I would like to propose some suggestions as to how our community and the heads of its institutions can respond when sexual abuse is uncovered, as well as offer measures we can take to prevent abuse. These suggestions go hand-in-hand with supporting the reporting of abuse to police and co-operating fully with all investigations. (Full disclosure: three weeks ago I was hired, along with my colleague Dr. Shira Berkovits, by Eitz Chaim Schools as an independent consultant to assess its current child protection and safety policies. We will be making recommendations and assisting in their implementation.)

The first step is admitting that abuse occurs in our communities, institutions and schools and that it is sometimes committed by those we trust – our teachers and our leaders.

The next step is for each and every institution to ensure that they know and fulfil their legal and moral obligations regarding disclosures about abuse, and that they embrace both accountability and transparency. These values should be the foundation for the community safety and protection policies each institution should develop and implement, followed by the training of those who work within their walls. Institutions should not wait until abuse has occurred for this step to be implemented, but should instead take more proactive steps to protect those they serve.





David Prashker, left, has been charged with possession and distribution of child pornography. Stephen Joseph Schacter faces charges of sexual assault and possession of child pornography.

For example, aside from assessing the physical environment of each building and ensuring that appropriate hiring and screening practices are used, they should have policies that encompass the following areas: behavioural guidelines for students and staff and the implementation of reporting, investigation and intervention protocols for when abuse arises. Guidelines for how to address historic cases of sexual abuse should be established as well because this is the specific area where the Jewish community is failing.

On their own, however, new policies are not sufficient. They need to be developed with an understanding of the ways in which the culture and structure of our community organizations, institutions and norms have allowed abuse to occur and persist.

When abuse arises, instead of ignoring this information or even attempting to cover it up, heads of institutions should come out strongly against the perpetrator and in support of the victims. Rather than think about their institution's reputation or about corporate values, such as how it will be affected financially if the abuse becomes public knowledge, leaders and board members should acknowledge the abuse and take appropriate action. Failing to do so can undermine their reputation and the values they claim to stand for, as well as erode public trust and respect.

Additionally, a meaningful apology, prayer service or restorative justice meeting with victims can be offered, as can paying for therapy for those who have been impacted by the abuse. These gestures would demonstrate that we practice what we preach when it comes to tshuvah, repentance, and that our sincere desire is to make amends.

Finally, since abuse is about more than just the perpetrator and victims, the entire community must be engaged in change. We need to empower people to ask questions and intervene when they see something amiss as well as educate them about having empathy for the victims. Unfortunately, empathy is often misguidedly gifted to perpetrators in these cases because of our relationships with them and because we often do not know who the victims are, making it difficult for us to identify with them.

Mishkan Avraham

Avrum Rosensweig

Sometimes a new phenomenon occurs in people's lives after they lose someone. They start going to shul.

This phenomenon can be dramatic, since a mourner finds himself attending synagogue twice a day – in the morning for Shacharit, and in the afternoon/evening for Minchah/Ma'ariv – and it's even more dramatic for those davening from the amud, or lectern, leading the prayer services.

Ask anyone who has gone through this spiritual metamorphosis what it's like, and frequently you'll hear, "It's not easy," or, from those in the GTA, "I often find myself speeding across the 407 to take in a late Minchah and to catch a Kaddish."

You might hear from a mourner that he davens Minchah at Zeifman's Accounting Firm on Bridgeland Avenue at 2 p.m. every day, or Ma'ariv at 10 p.m. at the Boat Shul, an ultra-Orthodox synagogue housed in an old boat store near Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street in Toronto.

I am one of these individuals.

Prior to my mom's passing on Dec. 8, I went to shul sparingly. Like many, my son and I tried different synagogues. However, we were spiritually fidgety – or perhaps I was. I couldn't relax, daven or simply be in the moment. Shul was a struggle. I couldn't find my way.

There were, however, a couple of shuls I grew very fond of even before my mom's passing (which helped with the transition), including Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. It is a unique environment, a true village. I have been saying Kaddish for my father on his yahrzeit there for 25 years. I believe Beth David, a Conservative shul, is so inclusive because of its leadership, starting with Rabbi Philip Scheim. Since my mother's passing, it is my weekday shul of choice.

Another shul I quite enjoy – my every-second-weekend shul – is Mishkan Avraham, a beautiful shtibl housed in the Ulpanat Orot School for girls on Canyon Avenue near Shepherd and Bathurst. The shul has been around for more than four decades. It is Orthodox, with participation from almost every male congregant.

> My son and I tried different synagogues. However, we were spiritually fidgety

Zev Kaufman is its co-ordinator extraordinaire (he is also seeded number 60 in the world in Scrabble). He runs a tight ship. Zev has a tremendous knowledge of those in the room able to lead the various services, others who can layn (read the Torah) and individuals who are quite adept at presenting compelling divrei Torah (words of Torah).

Recently the Aron Kodesh (the Holy Ark where the Torah scrolls are kept) was renovated. It's gorgeous, as the wall around the actual Ark is made of Jerusalem stone and the Ark itself is a woody chestnut brown and designed in layers.

Mishkan Avraham has a minyan on Friday night, Shabbat morning and Shabbat afternoon. Frequently, there will be a traditional kiddush with cholent, herring, eyer kichlach – all the foods a cardiologist would suggest for a healthy heart. The real story of Mishkan Avraham, however, is its rich and lengthy history and the fine, learned men and women who daven there.

My son and I feel at home at Mishkan Avraham. We are proud it is one of our spiritual homes while we go through this new phenomenon and memorialize my mother through Kaddish and prayer. If you're looking for a shul in Toronto, perhaps because you have lost a loved one, drop by Mishkan Avraham. Give it a spiritual try.

It is a hidden treasure amongst the plethora of shuls/synagogues/temples in our fair town. ■

Longing, I sought thy presence;
Lord, with my whole heart
did I call and pray.
And going out toward Thee,
I found Thee coming to me on my way.

The challenge of being a rabbi in the 21st century

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

What do you do at your new job? I have been asked this multiple times since moving to New York. The curiosity is quite understandable. What rabbis do is always a bit mysterious, so much so, that a favourite rabbinic joke is the story of the student who is thinking of becoming a rabbi and asks to meet his rabbi to ask a few questions. When the meeting starts, the young man turns to the rabbi and asks: "Rabbi, I know you give a sermon for 15 minutes every Shabbat morning. But what do you do the rest of the week?" The rabbi immediately retorted: "Young man, with questions like that, you don't want to be a rabbi. You want to be a synagogue president!"

What fills a rabbi's schedule is a grab bag of responsibilities far from the public eye.

But all joking aside, there is one question I've started to think about again since I've started my new job: what is a rabbi's mission?

One answer, attributed to Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, is that a rabbi is supposed to "comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable." I was disappointed to learn that the quote is actually from the film Inherit the Wind, but whatever the source, there is great wisdom to the quote, and it describes the mission of a rabbi perfectly.

A colleague once pointed out a similar pattern in prophetic literature.

Before any catastrophe, the prophets would rebuke, warning the people to change their ways. But afterward, when the people were exiled and hurt, the prophets would offer comfort and hope. The prophet's job was to afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted, and this is the mission of the rabbi as well.

But this mission is paradoxical: how can prophets and rabbis do two opposite things at the same time? One way to decipher this paradox is to recognize that parents are also called on to do two opposite things at the same time.

In their research on parenting, John Martin and Eleanor Maccoby noted that there are two elements to parenting styles: how demanding the parent is and how responsive the parent is. Permissive parents are responsive, but not demanding, while authoritarian parents are demanding but not responsive. But the ideal parent is authoritative, both responsive and demanding, and someone who knows how to comfort an afflicted child while at the same able to afflict the comfortable child and lead him or her to excellence.

The job of a parent and a prophet are pretty much the same: they lead their charges to excellence through a combination of demandingness, compassion and inspiration.

But we live in an age when the thought of demanding anything is foreign. It is difficult to speak about standards, as most people prefer to indulge and be indulged. The question for the modern rabbi is this: can you afflict the comfortable?

Even 2,000 years ago, the rabbis of the Talmud noted that "no one can rebuke, and no one can accept rebuke," and since then, afflicting the comfortable has gotten far less popular.

In 1902, William James noted: "We have now whole congregations whose preachers, far from magnifying our consciousness of sin, seem devoted rather to making little of it." Whatever the merits of what James calls the religion of the "healthy-minded", it is clear that an undemanding Judaism ceases to inspire, and at times ceases to be authentic.

As Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik points out, "Kedushah [sanctity] is not a paradise, but a paradox." Without the demands and challenges of kedushah, Judaism dissolves into a meaningless mush of nostalgia, a cultural artifact ready to be forgotten in the attic.

So we must move beyond comfort in our search for the spiritual. But as I run out of space, I must leave you with a simple question: how do we do this in the 21st century? ■

Israel must integrate its Arab citizens

Rabbi Dow Marmur

One of the many debates in contemporary Israel is whether it's to be a Jewish state or a state for all its citizens. Those who advocate the former usually want Israel to be Jewish according to Halachah, Jewish law as understood by Orthodoxy, to which non-Orthodox Jews and non-Jews must accommodate themselves.

The advocates of a state for all its citizens want Israel to be a western democracy in which religion and state are totally separate.

A broader and arguably more accurate understanding is to regard Israel as Jewish if it lives up to the teachings and values of Judaism such as justice and equality tolerantly applied to all who live there, irrespective of ethnic origin or religious affiliation.

Having been history's perennial "slaves in the land of Egypt," Jews should be sensitive to minorities in their midst. This means, of course, not only accepting different ways of being Jewish, but also treating non-Jews as equals.

Though Israel is taking small steps towards accepting all Jews – the decision to open a parallel egalitarian section at the Western Wall may be seen as yet another sign – some 20 per cent of its citizens, the Arabs, remain disadvantaged.

Arabs may work with Jews – though often more for Jews – and live as their neighbours, yet there's relatively little interaction between the two communities. What Palestinians deem to be Israeli occupation of their land and what Israelis experience as terrorist acts against Jews contribute to the enmity and the mutual mistrust.

That was behind the conference held last month at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem in memory of its founder, Rabbi David Hartman, who is well known in Canada, where he served a congregation in Montreal for many years. He died three years ago.

As the current president, Rabbi Donniel Hartman – David's son – reminded us, the institute is an indefatigable champion of openness and equality. Yet hitherto it has been primarily concerned with Jewish pluralism and seems to have neglected the cause of the Arabs in Israel. The conference, whose theme echoed Martin Luther King's "I have a dream" speech, was a signal of a new and most welcome addition to its agenda.

One of the supporters of this new initiative is none other than Israeli President Reuven Rivlin. Because he's said to be in favour of fully integrating Palestinians into Israeli society and apparently opposed to the so-called two-state solution, he's a staunch champion of equal rights for all Arabs in Israel. We were told that he would have attended the conference had he been in the country, but as he was abroad at the time, he sent a warm and supportive message arguing for meaningful coexistence.

Such coexistence, I heard an Arab speaker say at the conference, has so far been mainly the coexistence of horse and rider in which the Arab is the horse. At the end of the day, the horse may have done the hard work, but is only given hay to eat whereas the rider gets a steak for dinner. The inequality is there for all to see.

The Arab speakers I heard were among relatively few who have made it in Israel and now hold important positions in the country, but they're only a very small minority. Most belong to the disadvantaged and are made to feel as aliens or worse in the land where their ancestors have lived long before any of the families of their Jewish neighbours had arrived. One of the aims of Arabs and Jews now should be not to let their children inherit the disputes and inequality.

The conference began only hours after another terrible terrorist attack that cost the life of young Israeli soldier, injured badly her colleague and resulted in the death of the three Palestinian assailants. But this gathering wasn't about that. It was about justice for the indigenous Arab population of Israel. It's a necessary beginning. ■

No compromise on women's rights

Sheryl Saperia

A UNICEF report released last month estimates that 200 million girls and women in 30 countries have undergone female genital mutilation (FGM). While FGM is most prevalent in Africa, the Middle East and Asia, immigrants have imported the practice to North America and Europe.

Two U.S. gynecologists have recently made headlines suggesting that less invasive practices, such as small surgical nicks to girls' genitalia, should be allowed. They framed it as a compromise that would enable families to uphold cultural traditions while protecting girls from more dangerous forms of cutting.

This proposal is not new, and it has regularly been met with vociferous opposition from women's rights organizations.

To understand the arguments, some background on FGM is required. It's an uncomfortable subject, but FGM is a global problem. It exists in Canada, and we must confront it head on.

According to the World Health Organization (WHO), female genital mutilation includes all procedures that involve partial or total removal of the external female genitalia, or other injury to the female genital organs for non-medical reasons. Immediate complications include pain, hemorrhage, infection, shock and death. Assuming one survives, the long-term physical and psychological consequences are severe.

It is a misnomer to refer to FGM as female circumcision. Doriane Coleman, a Duke University law professor with an expertise in children and the law, rejects the analogy of FGM to male circumcision as "specious and disingenuous" because "the traditional forms of FGM are as different from male circumcision in terms of procedure, physical ramifications and motivation as ear piercing is to a penilectomy."

How, then, would "nicking" compare to male circumcision? There are two primary differences. The first is the WHO's assessment that FGM has no health benefits whatsoever, while observational data and randomized controlled trials demonstrate "that circumcised men have a significantly lower risk of becoming infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV)."

The second distinction is intent. Male circumcision for religious Jews relates to a covenant with God, and in Islam the ritual appears mainly about cleanliness. Secular families opting for circumcision for their sons can do so for esthetic preferences or health benefits.

In contrast, FGM is about curtailing a woman's sexuality. It aims to reduce a woman's libido and help her resist extramarital sexual acts. It is rooted in the belief that a woman must be controlled and submissive. And, as explored in the film Honor Diaries, FGM is part of an honour code to which women are conditioned to adhere, a manifestation of the belief that a family's honour is contained in women, to be guarded by men.

One woman interviewed in the movie recalls her own experience undergoing the procedure: "I remember before it began, I was still lying there. She was negotiating with my mom with the money. And my mom had to pay her extra for using a new razor." Certainly from the perspective of harm reduction, the benefits of nicking in a sterile, western doctor's office are clear.

But the WHO cautions against normalizing and condoning the practice, thereby "hindering long-term efforts for eliminating FGM."

I asked Raheel Raza, a Canadian featured in Honor Diaries, for her thoughts on the "compromise." She opposes it: "We are trying to take 10 steps ahead, and then some well-wisher or someone who has never experienced FGM takes it in the wrong direction. There must be no compromise."

This issue must be exposed to sunlight here in Canada, where there are no statistics on the number of FGM cases within its borders, let alone resources or institutional supports to assist FGM victims. Parliament, whether through the House of Commons or the Senate human rights committee or the office of the Minister for Status of Women, should immediately take up the cause of FGM and honour-based violence.

Neither compromise nor outright denial is an option. ■

Concerns raised about physician-assisted death policy

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Supreme Court has spoken, the legislative wing is deliberating, but some in the Jewish community are uncomfortable with the direction the country is going in adopting a policy on physician-assisted suicide.

Discussion on the topic is now so normalized that an acronym has arisen, PAD, referring to it as physician-assisted dying.

As is the case throughout Canada, the Jewish community is not of one mind when it comes to public policy regarding the issue. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) canvassed a broad spectrum of opinion in the Jewish community and presented a series of suggestions to the minister of justice that would regulate how the policy is implemented.

CIJA found support for the initiative on compassionate grounds, along with concerns that safeguards are needed to avoid the proverbial slippery slope that could lead to assisted deaths beyond the narrow bounds contemplated by its advocates.

But there are voices in the community who are deeply troubled with the idea that physicians – whose mandate is to preserve life and heal the sick – would participate in ending lives. Others worry that once implemented, a policy of assisted dying in a narrow band of circumstances will gradually broaden to include situations not originally contemplated by proponents of the policy, including "informed minors."

The current situation grew out of a Supreme Court ruling one year ago that struck down, on constitutional grounds, sections of the Criminal Code that made it illegal to help someone commit suicide. The court stated the law would remain in effect for one year before it lapsed. It later extended the deadline to June 2016.

The brief CIJA presented to the minister notes that "many in the Jewish community support the Supreme Court's decision as a moral imperative, empathizing with the rights of the terminally ill to end their lives on their own terms. Many others oppose it for a variety of reasons including traditional religious principles and fear of a slippery slope toward a more broad-based application of euthanasia in Canadian society."

Noah Shack, CIJA's director of policy, said consensus in the community is conditional on the protection of physicians who object on moral or religious grounds; that consent is informed, competent and not coerced; and that PAD is only one option among many, including increased access to palliative care.

Psychiatrist Janice Halpern is deeply troubled by the direction Canadian society and the medical establishment are going regarding PAD. She attended a recent seminar at Mount Sinai Hospital and was shocked at the casual way the subject was discussed. "I felt a horrified feeling. Here we are talking about the logistics of killing people," she said.

As a physician, she's unhappy doctors will be asked to be complicit in ending a life. "We're civilized... You don't kill people who suffer. You try to help them," she said.

She suggested that instead of ending a person's life, Canada should devote more resources to expanding palliative care and providing counselling to support individuals and families in trying times.

Critics worry that families will feel pressured.

Halpern also believes PAD will coarsen Canadian society. "I don't think people will value life in the same way," she said.

The door is being opened to a social norm in which people who are suffering will see themselves as a burden to their families, children and society. "People could feel that they should kill themselves," she added.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin doesn't believe people will be intimidated into ending their lives. "It's an interesting emotional argument, but in jurisdictions where it exists, there is no evidence of it," he said.

Rabbi Dolgin, senior rabbi at the Reform Temple Sinai, believes that in Jewish tradition, "bringing someone's life to an end prematurely is ethically wrong and problematic." The question, he said, is what is "prematurely?"

Rabbi Dolgin, who stressed he was speaking for himself, said that "instead of extending life, we're extending suffering. I've sat with too many people, whose family member is dying and is in extraordinary pain, and they say, 'Rabbi, I don't understand. We treat our pets better.'"

"Lots of energy in Canada is being devoted to an issue that will affect a small number of people and not enough energy to the lack of palliative care," he added.

He cautioned, however, that PAD should be implemented with safeguards so that it's not extended to people with mental health issues or to minors.

Bracha Silver has had up-close exposure to the health care system and is far from confident patients and families won't be influenced, or even intimidated, into agreeing to end a life. Silver's 25-year-old son, Avi, spent his last 3-1/2 months in hospital suffering from a brain tumour.

Doctors at the hospital were kind and considerate, but one "eventually came down on us because Avi had lived a little longer than he wanted him to. He said, 'He's going to die anyway. Why are you being cruel by prolonging his suffering and his life?'"

Silver also felt the doctor didn't want the hospital to incur the expense of keeping her son alive. As an Orthodox woman, her response was "as long as he has a breath in him, he's alive. Who are they to tell me how long to live? It's God's business to determine who lives and who dies, to the precise second. There are reasons that go beyond our understanding in the world." While most of the doctors were kind and respectful, Silver said she's concerned others might unduly influence patients and their families to take steps they might not otherwise take. ■

Schulich Leader Scholarships at Technion

Rewarding academic excellence, nurturing innovation and strengthening the community

By Roberta Neiger

Whether they plan to address subjects as diverse as climate change, medical technology, the food crisis, space travel, or others; Schulich Leaders are united by a single desire: to change the world.

Scholastic merit, technological innovation, and public service: Schulich Leader Scholarships rests on these three pillars. Bolstering exceptional young people who both embrace Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics (STEM) fields, and demonstrate exceptional leadership, the scholarship rewards excellence throughout Israel and Canada across 25 leading universities.

Launched in 2011, the program funds 50 undergraduate scholarships in Israel and another 50 across Canada each year. The largest program in both countries to target undergraduate STEM students, Schulich Leader Scholarships range from $30,000 to $40,000 in Israel. The program bears the name of Canadian philanthropist Seymour Schulich, for whom the Technion Faculty of Chemistry is named.

> "This scholarship makes the difference between studying and not studying."

At Technion, Schulich Leaders come from various backgrounds, geographically, ethnically, financially and academically.

For example, 19-year-old Hadeel Abu Asaad is an Israeli Arab from Nazareth. A first-year student, Abu Asaad comes from modest circumstances and must assume complete responsibility for her expenses. "For me," she says, "this scholarship makes the difference between studying and not studying."

Enrolled in the Faculty of Biomedical Engineering, Abu Asaad is motivated by making a contribution, along with the drive to succeed. "In my department we can reveal new phenomena, and in turn, make changes that can change the course of disease."

Ori Michael, a new father, is looking towards the next generation. "I can now concentrate on my studies, without worrying about working," says the 25-year-old mechanical engineering student whose first child, a son, was born just three days before this interview. "You can just imagine what this award means to me and my wife," he says.

> "[The Program] introduced me to high-quality, interesting people, and has acquainted me with different voluntary organizations."

"Also, in terms of personal mission and responsibility, the scholarship enables me to do my maximum for Israel, in my field, mechanical engineering. My dream is to work for a company like Rafael."

ROI SINOFF

"The scholarship gives me the financial freedom to concentrate on my studies," says Roi Sinoff, 25, from Haifa. "It introduced me to high-quality, interesting people, and has acquainted me with different voluntary organizations."

As a Schulich Leader, Sinoff volunteers in the SpaceIL program, which uses space travel to stimulate youngsters' - particularly girls' - interest in math and science. Additionally, he has served as "a big brother" to a high school student. "Teaching is my fantasy," says Sinoff. "I want to influence young people the same way my best high school and college teachers motivated me."

"Receiving the Schulich Leader Scholarship was a great honour," says Julieta Arakelian, a fourth-year computer science student. "On a day-to-day level, the financial advantages are obvious, and allow me to dedicate all my time to study," adds the Argentinian-born student.

Socially, the scholarship has also benefited Arakelian. "There are great side benefits, like gatherings for the recipients. This group includes many different types of people; these connections have become very important to me."

Arakelian, 25, ultimately wants to make her contribution by developing medical technology.

Summarizing the sentiments of all Schulich Leaders at Technion, Ori Michael says "we are determined to contribute the maximum amount of imagination and creativity towards these fields," adding "this is just the beginning."

Development blamed for flooding veterans' graves

DANIEL OTIS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

They served Canada in two world wars – young Jewish men fighting for freedom. More than 300 of them are now buried at the Jewish Canadian Veterans Memorial Park in North York. But unbefitting the dignity they deserve, in recent years, their graves have repeatedly been flooded.

"This is sacred land," said Allan Rubin, president of the Jewish Canadian Veterans Memorial Park Association. "Respect [is due] for those who have passed and the families that are still here."

Located at the northern end of Mount Sinai Memorial Park on Wilson Avenue, the cemetery inters Jewish Army, Navy and Air Force servicemen. Adorned with monuments dedicated to the thousands of Canadian Jews who served in both world wars, it's the only memorial of its kind in the country. Since 2014, however, Rubin says development on the adjacent Downsview Lands has repeatedly damaged veterans' graves.

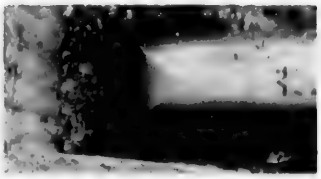
"For me, it's very emotional, because I know all these guys," said Rubin, a Cold War Air Force veteran. "What's wrong with the engineering of this project?"

The 572-acre Downsview Lands are overseen by the Canada Lands Company (CLC), a crown corporation that manages and sells federally owned property. Formerly a military base, the area now houses an airfield, offices, sports facilities, the 294-acre Downsview Park, and five former military housing subdivisions earmarked for new residential developments. Immediately north of the cemetery, and bordering the Jewish veterans section, developers Urbancorp and Mattamy Homes have been working on the first of these neighbourhoods, known as Stanley Greene, since 2014.

Tensions between CLC and the Jewish veterans association began when Stanley Greene surveyors drove nearly a dozen stakes into cemetery land and graves without seeking permission. In December 2014, after Stanley Greene's old sewage system was torn out, the cemetery's groundwater levels rose significantly, Rubin said, filling and collapsing several open graves. The problem persisted well into the spring.

"There was one plot that we had to pump pretty much right until the time when the casket came down the road," Rubin said of one burial last May. "We covered the water that remained with leaves so the family wouldn't notice any difference, but by the time they started filling the grave, the water came pretty much up to the lid of the casket."

Not wanting to cause any undue duress, Rubin said veterans' families weren't informed of the flooding incidents, and the CLC promised to fix the problem.



Water seeps into an open plot at Jewish Canadian Veterans Memorial Park.

Rubin thought the issue was resolved, but in January of this year, a worker at Stanley Greene left two water pipes running at the site for five days. The water flooded the adjacent cemetery, but this time, sub-zero temperatures froze the water, and Rubin won't be able to assess whether the concrete foundations of the site's monuments have been damaged until the ground thaws in the spring.

With the Stanley Greene development now graded several feet above the cemetery, the thaw may lead to more flooding, Rubin said.

A CLC official denied that work at Stanley Greene has caused the repeated flooding of the cemetery. "The groundwater levels seem to be naturally occurring," Rodger Martin, CLC's vice-president of real estate, told The CJN. "They're high on our side as well."

Martin said Stanley Greene's new sewage system was installed prior to the January flooding. No other specific measures were taken to mitigate the cemetery's groundwater problem, he said, and with building permits already issued by the City of Toronto, construction is imminent.

"We've been in contact with [Rubin, and] we'll continue to be in contact with him with whatever concerns he may have," Martin added.

York Centre city councillor Maria Augimeri is a longtime critic of Ottawa's Downsview Lands development plan.

"They've shown a real contempt – more than just disrespect," Augimeri said about the CLC's handling of the flooding.

The area's new MP, however, is confident the issue will be resolved.

"The lines of communication seem to be good," Michael Levitt said. "I'm hopeful that this sort of mistake, which seemed to be quite an isolated incident, won't be happening again."

Rubin isn't holding his breath.

"Before they go forward with construction, the water issue should be resolved," he said. "According to the law, you're responsible for containing the water on your property… But how do we sue a giant like Canada Lands? We just don't have that kind of money." ■

Where are the Ontario kosher chickens?

plungen@thecjn.ca

About two years ago, the Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO), the industry association that administers the chicken production quota in Ontario, announced it would accept bids for an allocation of chickens for the kosher market. The move came after Chai Poultry sold its quota and ceased operations, leaving an absence of provincially produced kosher chickens. Last week, The CJN reported that seven groups presented bids, and three advanced to a second round, but eventually all withdrew. Currently, the CFO has asked Deloitte, a consulting firm, to consider two fresh bids.

This week, representatives of the three finalists and one of the current bidders look at the roles of the CFO and the Kashruth Council of Canada, known as COR, in the bidding process.

Montreal's Marvid supplies poultry in Toronto.

Following meetings with CFO representatives, it became clear to Avi Kraman, who headed one of the final three bids, that they preferred the successful applicant use COR. "They worded it that they wanted someone recognized in Toronto and in the rest of Ontario," he said.

What's more, "COR was looking to offer its full services to anyone becoming the chicken producer... COR would give local processors the exclusivity to distribute to the institutions and caterers that are under COR," Kraman said.

COR spokesperson Richard Rabkin, however, denied that suggestion: "With respect to granting exclusivity, COR never made any such commitment to anyone and any assertion to the contrary is entirely false."

Despite what they perceived as a push for COR, Kraman's group decided that if it was going to move away from another local rabbis' group, which had agreed to provide supervision, it was going to go with MK, the Montreal kashrut agency. "We felt that MK had a more recognized certification, in Ontario and the United States," he said.

To Kraman, it was clear the CFO was concerned about the group's kosher certification. "In our estimation, from the get-go, there was already a partnership going on with the COR," he said.

In conversations with CFO representatives, questions were repeatedly raised about their choice of MK as a certifier, he added. "He was trying to push us to go to COR, 100 per cent," Kraman said.

"CFO said you have to understand the reality of your situation. COR controls Toronto and Ontario, and without them, you're not going to get the allotment into their catering, restaurants or shops," Kraman recounted.

Steve Strauss is a partner in one of the two groups whose plans are currently being studied by Deloitte. His group has chosen COR as its certifier, and he believes the other finalist has also done so. Strauss said "the CFO may be looking to avoid issues in the future with facilities that are under COR, because COR may have issue with other certifications as it pertains to kosher chicken."

COR's standards are among the strictest in North America, which can raise processing costs. "From a kashrut standard, that's a good thing, but from an operations perspective, it's challenging," he said.

Strauss said the CFO recognizes that for chickens to get the widest possible distribution in the community, it would have to satisfy COR's strict standards. "CFO is driving the bus, and we're in the back seat with COR being driven along," he said.

"COR is not at fault by any means for the lack of kosher chicken supply in Ontario," Strauss continued. "The bigger problem lies with the CFO. The CFO has no way of knowing what is a kosher standard, therefore, they've chosen to use the most widely accepted kashrut certifier in Ontario."

Meanwhile, in its meeting with the CFO board, Kraman's group was startled to learn that awarding the allotment would be conditional and could be withdrawn at the CFO's discretion. That meant going into business without any certainty of the supply of chickens, which put their multi-million investment at risk, he said.

After the meeting, Kraman felt the deck was stacked against them, since his group's allotment would come from those of other producers. "They [the CFO] never had an intention to award anyone a kosher allotment," he said. "The guys on the board are the ones losing [part of their set chicken quotas]. The CFO was going through the motions."

Rabbi Kalman Ochs was at the CFO board meeting, which took place before Kraman's group switched to MK. He'd been brought on as an adviser, and at that point, the Kraman group was still looking to Agudas Shomrei Hadas, an organization founded by Ochs' grandfather in 1947, to provide hashgachah.

"At the end of the day, the whole thing is a hoax. They don't want to give us kosher chickens," Rabbi Ochs said. "The story keeps changing [as to] why they don't give us kosher chickens. They changed the rules of the game after we met all their requirements."

Ron Gersh agrees the deck is stacked against the bidding groups. Gersh, a consultant who worked with one of the groups, believes the CFO's plan was to give Marvid time to ramp up production and meet the supply needs of Ontario consumers.

"It's a monopoly. They're giving up their quotas. They didn't like that. They set it up so nobody could win it," Gersh said.

Yoav Dohbot won't go that far, but said meeting the CFO's requirements was "challenging." He was part of the third finalist group, which had COR lined up as its certification agency, but blanched at the CFO's requirements, which he said made no business sense.

"It required that the bidders have everything in place to go the next day, the financing, an operation [to slaughter the chickens]. But... nobody in their right mind is going to spend a few million dollars without having the quota secured," he said.

All three of the first-round finalists have moved on. Contacted by The CJN, CFO spokesperson Michael Edmonds said: "CFO has engaged Deloitte to review all new applications from a business and economic perspective. We are following a disciplined, fact-based review process, and as such, we are not in a position to make further comments at this time." ■

Asian-Canadian students visit Israel on CIJA mission

sshefa@thecjn.ca

When retired pharmacist Murray Rubin took notice of the anti-Israel climate on Canadian campuses, he wanted to do something about it.

"I first got the idea that... Jews need allies because I looked at what is going on in our universities and it's a matter of numbers. Jewish kids are vastly outnumbered," he said.

He approached the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) with an idea to send Canadian students of Asian heritage to Israel on an educational mission, and went to work soliciting funds – $100,000 – from his peers at his tennis club.

He explained that having worked with a number of people of Asian heritage throughout his career, he came to understand that in general, anti-Semitism wasn't as big of an issue in Asian countries compared to other parts of the world.

"I know that the whole world is not anti-Semitic. If it were, we would have disappeared a long time ago. The people who aren't anti-Semitic, are... indifferent. This isn't their problem. However, if we try, maybe we can get a few of them... to speak up for us," Rubin said.

Judy Zelikovitz CIJA's vice-president of university and local partner services, said CIJA has been organizing similar missions to Israel for about 10 years. Typically, the missions are geared toward Jewish and non-Jewish politicians and other Canadians with influence, but there have been trips that have sent students to Israel as well.

"Historically, participants in our missions have come back and become great friends to the community. One student came back a few years ago and single-handedly was responsible for overturning a [boycott, divestment and sanctions] vote on his campus in Regina, so we're looking for people who are going to be genuine partners moving forward," Zelikovitz said.

Last month, seven students of Asian descent – hailing from the University of Toronto, the University of Western Ontario, the University of British Columbia, McMaster University and York University – took part in the seven-day trip.

The program included pre-and post-trip seminars, a seven-day study program in Israel, and a post-trip written assignment or creative project on a topic related to the program.

Some of the activities and sites visited included the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, Masada, Jaffa, the Knesset and Supreme Court, a Jerusalem security barrier, and Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust museum.

Tina Jiwon Park in Jerusalem

The speakers they heard from included former Israeli ambassador to China Amos Nadai; Canadian Ambassador to Israel Vivian Bercovici; Hebrew University law professor Allen Zysblat, who spoke about human rights and international law; and Ha'aretz's chief military correspondent and defence analyst Amos Harel.

Tina Jiwon Park, a PhD candidate at U of T and co-founder and executive director of the Canadian Centre for the Responsibility to Protect – an organization that aims to galvanize the international community to come to the aid of victims of genocide and other crimes against humanity – was one of the participants on the trip.

She said that because of the work she does through her organization, she was grateful for the opportunity to visit Israel and to learn more about the Holocaust and genocide education at Yad Vashem.

Park said that although the Middle East crisis is complex, she gained a deeper appreciation for the challenges Israel faces.

"Being of Korean origin, I can certainly understand what it's like to be surrounded by hostile neighbours, and throughout this visit, I came to better appreciate the nuances and complexities of the strategic situation on the ground," she said.

"I've only began to fathom the complexity of life in the Middle East, and this trip certainly helped to deepen my appreciation of the histories, events and different narratives that define Israel's geopolitics... We hear so much about the tensions and conflicts in the media, but I also saw a lot of coexistence between different cultures, religions and people, which was really fascinating," she said, adding that she was "struck by the vibrancy and diversity of culture throughout Israel."

Rubin said he hopes participants will use the lessons they learned from the mission to inform others in their community about the reality in the Middle East and the scourge of anti-Semitism.

"The idea that people can say that Israel is an apartheid state is so sick that it makes me want to [send people] to go there and see. It's ridiculous, but they get away with it." ■

Local Jews to join Poles in recalling righteous family

plungen@thecjn.ca

Seventy-two years ago, the Holocaust banged on the door of the Ulma family, knocked it down, dragged them all away and ended the lives of 16 people.

The eight Polish Jews and eight ethnic Poles died in March 1944 – members of the Diner, Grunfeld and Goldman families, along with Jozef and Wiktoria Ulma, their six children and the unborn child Wiktoria was carrying.

The Ulmas had been hiding the Jewish families long after the majority of the Jews of Markowa, a village in south eastern Poland, had been rounded up and murdered in 1942.

They knew the risks they were facing, yet the Ulmas, along with eight other Polish families, defied the Nazis. In the end, they were betrayed by a local collaborator and were executed along with the Jews they were hiding.

On March17, their sacrifice will be recognized in Poland and in Toronto as a museum in their honour is dedicated in Markowa.

Congregation Habonim, along with the Consulate General of Poland and the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, will co-host an event in Toronto to mark the opening of The Museum of Poles Saving Jews, in Markowa.

A few hours earlier in Poland, the country's president, Andrzej Duda, will address an audience of dignitaries in a dedication ceremony that is expected to make national headlines.

The event is "part of the revival of Polish-Jewish relations [recognizing] our common history in Poland," said Andrzej Szydlo, the Toronto-based consul responsible for diaspora relations. "The fact that the president of Poland is attending the event signifies that it is an event of national importance."

Szydlo noted that everyone is familiar with Auschwitz, the Nazi death camp located in Poland. "Now another piece of the puzzle is in place."

The museum itself was founded by the provincial government of Podkarpackie. It features Museum Square, which houses a monument to Holocaust victims as well as memorial plaques with the names of Poles murdered for helping Jews.

Szydlo said the Ulma family were "simple people" who, "in the name of humanity, risked their lives and perished."

Eli Rubenstein, spiritual leader at Congregation Habonim, which was founded by Holocaust survivors, said, "This is an important story to be told, honoured and celebrated."

Jozef and Wiktoria Ulma

Yad Vashem has recognized more than 6,000 Poles as Righteous Among the Nations, including the Ulma family, but the museum in Markowa is the first of its kind to be dedicated to the Righteous, he said.

"It's wonderful to see a museum that teaches us about such courageous and noble examples of the human spirit and that inspires us to follow in their footsteps," Rubenstein added.

Two survivors who were saved by Poles will speak on March 17. Joe Gottdenker was an infant who was left in the care of Petronolo and Wladyslaw Ziolo for three years. He reunited with his parents after the war.

Sally Wasserman was eight years old when she was smuggled out of the Dombrowa Ghetto and hidden by Eva and Mikolaj Turkin.

Franciszek Pasławski, the only known Righteous Gentile living in Canada, is also expected to attend.

Rubenstein said creation of the museum comes at a time when relations between Jews and Poles are being debated in Polish society. For many Jews, relations with their Polish neighbours were problematic, and many do not recall with fondness their experiences with Poles during the war. At the far end of the spectrum was the July 1941 incident in Jedwabne in which two dozen Polish villagers killed 340 Jews by locking them in a barn and setting it on fire.

At the other end of the scale is the heroism in Markowa and the thousands of other righteous Poles. Both incidents are part of a complicated story of Polish-Jewish relations that ought to be told, Rubenstein said.

In addition to the co-hosts, other sponsors include the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Canadian Friends of Polin: the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, March of the Living, the Raoul Wallenberg Centre for Human Rights, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. ■

Ex-Chassid speaks about being trans, leaving the fold

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Abby Stein

Abby Stein's Facebook page looks like those of so many 20-somethings: there are ample selfies of the 24-year-old Columbia University student posing in a variety of outfits and makeup styles, there are playful shots of Abby with friends, and there's the requisite throwback baby photograph.

But scroll back far enough through her photos and the pictures of Abby are suddenly very different: in them, Abby is not Abby.

She is – she was – a bearded man dressed in full chassidic garb, replete with payes, shtreiml and bekishe.

Around 2012, Stein left the insular, Yiddish-speaking chassidic community where she grew up in the Williamsburg area of Brooklyn, N.Y., and three years later, she came out publicly as transgender, changing her name and beginning the process of physically transitioning from male to female.

On March 15, Stein will be speaking about her experiences at a roundtable on Judaism and gender identity at Montreal's Mile End Chavurah and on March 18, she'll speak at Temple Emanu-el-Beth Sholom, also in Montreal.

Stein was invited to speak in Montreal by a fledgling local group called Forward, whose aim is to be in Montreal what the more established organization Footsteps is in New York: a support network that offers a range of services to ultra-Orthodox Jews who've left, or are trying to leave, the fold.

Created by several former Montreal Chassids just over a year ago, Forward holds regular gatherings for people who've left ultra-Orthodox communities.

Their aim is to acquire funding to do things such as provide psychological and social work services to those in need, and to rent an apartment as respite space for those who've left, or were kicked out of, their family homes.

"I left the community myself. It's not only hard, it's inconceivably hard… We see people [who've left ultra-Orthodox communities] jumping off roofs. We have to and we will do something about it," said Hershy Moskovits, one of Forward's founders.

Stein credits much of what she's accomplished to Footsteps, which she found online in 2012 not long after discovering the Internet itself.

With Footsteps' help, despite having rudimentary English and no secular education, Stein has gotten her high school equivalency, become fluent in English and enrolled at Columbia, where she's a second-year gender studies major.

She recently started a support group for transgender people from Orthodox backgrounds and, as an avid blogger (she came out as trans via blog, in a post that garnered 20,000 views overnight), has become a role model for former ultra-Orthodox Jews – both LGBTQ and not.

"I see people in this group who've been doubly in the closet – both as [non-believers] and as transgender people… And I'm sure there's 10 times as many people who want to come but are afraid," Stein said.

While she didn't begin seriously questioning her faith until adolescence, Stein said there was never a time she didn't feel like a girl.

"My conscious memories are of feeling like there was some misunderstanding… of lying in bed as a child and dreaming of ways I could become a girl, imagining I could be reborn," she said.

At 12, she began reading forbidden texts, starting with the books of the prophets and moving to biblical criticism and Kabbalah.

"By 15, I felt like I was done with this whole Judaism thing. I had too many questions," she said.

At 18, she was married, and "seeing a woman's life up close made me realize, 'I want that.'"

After her son was born, she saw the "obsession with a kid's gender from the beginning," and felt she had to leave the community.

Although Stein hoped leaving would resolve her gender issues, her experience of what she now recognizes as gender dysphoria triggered deep depressions, and after a particularly dark period, she knew she had to address it.

"I sort of gave in and started my transition [to becoming a woman], and it's the best decision I've ever made," Stein said.

One of her biggest goals is to get people in the chassidic community talking about transgender issues, so that people who are struggling understand that they're not alone.

"Even if they talk about it with hate and mockery, I'd say it's a topic where no publicity is bad publicity," Stein said. ■

Next Einstein competition is looking for a 'genius' idea

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Inspired by Albert Einstein, the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) is looking for a "genius" idea.

Einstein changed the world with the power of an idea, and with that in mind, CHFU's third annual Next Einstein competition invites people with enterprising spirit, curiosity, creativity and inventiveness to submit a novel concept to help make the world a better place.

The Next Einstein initiative was established in 2013 by CFHU in conjunction with Hebrew U, which is the custodian of Einstein's estate.

"The DNA of Hebrew University is curiosity. It's about exploring. It's about trying to uncover. We felt we needed to do something to pass on the inspiration of Albert Einstein, so we created a competition that would engage the audience," said Rami Kleinmann, president and CEO of CFHU.

Next Einstein is open to anyone over age 13 with an idea in a category such as medical biotech, education, health and wellness, technology, arts and culture, environment, science and aerospace and political/economic sustainability.

The contest, which closes March 16, expects to receive some 1,000 entries. Participants are vying for a $10,000 prize and a $5,000 Einstein Legacy student scholarship.

Creativity and inspiration have no age boundaries. The winner of the inaugural contest was Charles Rose, a 70-year-old retired science teacher in London, Ont., who developed a method to genetically modify dragonflies to reduce the harmful effects of atmospheric carbon dioxide.

Last year's Next Einstein prize went to 13-year-old Marin Schultz, who created a low-cost, 3D-printed prosthetic arm to increase mobility for people with disabilities.

The CJN spoke to Schultz, now 15, by phone from his home in Lethbridge, Alta., where he explained his winning idea and the gift of bringing people joy.

"For me, science and designing robotics in particular has always come from a place of seeing a need and trying to figure out how I can help," he said.

"In 2012 at the Lethbridge Regional Science Fair, I built a voice-controlled robotic rover, which, depending on what was spoken, would move left, right, forwards or backwards. This project sparked my interest in robotic control systems.

"The next year I came back to the science fair with an EEG [electro-encephalography]-controlled rubber robotic hand, which I had hacked from a Jedi Force Trainer toy [providing the EEG headset]. The more the wearer concentrated, the more the hand would close. At the fair, a one-handed boy came up to my project and tried on the headset. When he was able to close the hand just by concentrating, he became very excited and said 'Dad! I can close the hand!' From that moment on, I have been inspired to pursue my research in advancing prosthetic technology," he added.

"One of my goals was to keep my prosthetics below $1,000. This means by using 3D-printing technology, there could be 'hubs' set up in developing countries where parts of the prosthetics could be custom 3D-printed on site and built with off-the-shelf parts and sensors."

The judges – a panel of 11 creative thinkers and innovators from diverse backgrounds, led by Prof. Roger Kornberg, a Nobel Laureate in chemistry from Stanford University – will evaluate the vetted submissions.

"The Next Einstein Competition gives people a creative, scientific mission, asking them to share their understanding, research and vision with others," Kornberg said.

The judging panel will draw up a shortlist of three finalists, with the general public voting for the winner. Public voting will run April 8 to 13, and the winner will be announced April 18. Ideas are submitted online, vetted and published before being short-listed.

"I think a genius doesn't know the meaning of the word 'can't' and doesn't know what a limitation is. This competition is a beautiful way for anybody from any background to be able to shape the world in a new way," said panel judge Tori Avey, a food history blogger and PBS columnist, from her office in Los Angeles. ■

Personal approach leads to record $8.3-million Vancouver campaign

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) closed another stellar campaign last month with a record haul of $8.3 million – $300,000 more than the previous year.

But the dollar figure was just one among many important numbers in the fundraising drive, said marketing director Becky Saegert.

"We had 75 new canvassers among our 292 canvassers and 409 campaign volunteers. What that figure really means is what it can do for the community, what it enables us to accomplish and the many more lives that can be touched."

This year's campaign also differed from last year's in that it involved many more face-to-face meetings between canvassers and potential donors.

There were over 600 meetings, said federation CEO Ezra Shanken.

"It's deeply powerful to sit with someone across a table and say to them, 'I really need you to help these people in need, to take responsibility for the destiny of our community.'"

Still, he had no idea those meetings would achieve such a stellar fundraising result. This year there were 225 new donors to the campaign and 60 per cent of the donors who had in-person meetings increased their gifts, he said.

"We had people sitting down and talking about what happens in our community, which is at the heart of the campaign, and it's amazing. We've known for years that people's authentic conversations drive an increased commitment to the community, and we believe it's the way to drive a successful campaign."

Stephen Gaerber, board chair of JFGV, said he's witnessed first hand the profound reach of the campaign.

"The high cost of living in Vancouver has made it difficult for many community members to connect with Jewish life, either because they cannot afford to live centrally or because they cannot afford to participate. The federation annual campaign addresses issues like these, builds connections between our community and our partnership region in Israel, and helps Jews in need around the world," Gaerber said in a statement.

"This record campaign result will provide the support we and our partners need to touch more lives than ever before." ■

The community must respond

In my research, I have found that there are those who believe that sexual predators are drawn to religious institutions because these are places of trust, while others feel that the careless attitude that these institutions have toward abuse helps develop predators. It can very well be a combination of both, in which pedophiles know they will be able to hide in a religious institution that has a habit of ignoring sex crimes.

Some have suggested that religious institutions are only safer now than in the past because they have been repeatedly sued and shamed by victims who have been brave enough to come forward. Whether or not this is true, it does not have to be this way. Moreover, there is a self-interest at play for institutions to implement the above recommendations. An organization that properly reports abuse and appropriately takes care of its problems is more likely to be trusted in the future than one that tries to hide it. Administrators and boards, therefore, have a vested interest in putting appropriate policies in place, beyond the moral and Jewish imperative.

Our institutions and their leaders can take the steps to both prevent abuse and make lasting changes to the way they respond to abuse – steps that go beyond simply protecting reputations. It is only through the involvement of everyone in our communities that abuse will become an issue we fight against, rather than one that is ignored. ■

Benchimol is a consultant for Jewish institutions on their community safety and protection policies.

Ottawa Orthodox day schools to unite under one roof

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Parents at Ottawa's two Orthodox elementary day schools – Torah Academy of Ottawa and the Chabad-affiliated Rambam Day School – have voted to come together as one school starting next year.

"I think there was a realization that in a small community like Ottawa, we're better off having one school. With more students, there are better educational opportunities," said Bram Bregman, the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's vice-president of community building, who helped facilitate the unification.

"Torah Academy has roughly 80 students, and Rambam has roughly 45 students. One school of 125 students has more social opportunities, better educational opportunities and instead of paying for two overheads and two rents, you can invest that money into educational opportunities to ensure that it is an outstanding school, both in the Judaic studies… and general studies."

Bram Bregman

Through the nine months of meetings and discussions, each school was represented by a committee of parents and board members, headed by Debbie Scharf, a Torah Academy parent, and Evan Green, a Rambam parent.

Bregman explained that although the student bodies from both schools are coming together under one roof, this is not a legal merger of the two organizations.

He said the "memorandum of understanding" was ratified Feb. 18 after a vote by the parent bodies of both schools.

"There was an overwhelming majority of parents from both schools who voted to unify," he said.

"The unified school is a neutral Torah-based school, and the idea is that there is much more in common, at the elementary level in particular, that everyone can come together and learn together under one roof and in one school community," he said.

Bregman explained that a task force will be formed next year to explore the best location for the unified school, which offers education from preschool to Grade 8.

"They will explore the current [Torah Academy] building, where they will be for at least year one. There is a school building on the Jewish Community Campus of Ottawa, which currently houses the Ottawa Jewish Community School, but there would be enough space in that building to also house the unified Orthodox school. Or they'll look at another option that no one thought of yet," Bregman said.

In the coming months, there will also be a parent vote to give the school a new name, and a search is on for a new head of school.

"We want to have a fresh feel for the school," Bregman said.

He said tuition fees should stay roughly the same – about $9,500 a year for one child and $8,600 for each additional child from the same family.

"I think having a strong unified Orthodox school can really further help grow and strengthen the Ottawa Jewish community. I think this is a step in the right direction and I think it is going to do great things for our community."

Rabbi Dovid Hayes, Rambam's executive director, said he's happy about the decision to bring the two schools together.

"Unity is what will give our children a better education," Rabbi Hayes said.

"Parents in the community of Ottawa want excellence in education for their children. When you really want something, you make it happen… There is no doubt that together we can have a superb, unbelievable educational system." ■

Limmud Winnipeg seeks to appeal to younger people

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

This year, Limmud Winnipeg – which is scheduled for the weekend of March 12-13 – will have a few new wrinkles.

"We are trying to attract more younger people, as well as Gray Academy students," says Judi Shuster, one of three chairs this year of Limmud, which is marking its sixth year.

To that end, Limmud Winnipeg is featuring among its 36 speakers Barry Bender, an American Jewish educator who is well known to students and graduates of to Gray Academy, Winnipeg's kindergarten-to-Grade 12 Jewish day school.

For the past 30 years and more, Bender has been coming to Winnipeg from New York every January to lead a Jewish awareness retreat for Gray Academy high school students. At Limmud, he will be doing presentations on Jewish meditation and "Judaism, science and the first seven days of Creation."

Also appearing will be Winnipeg rapper Jeremy Hecht and Andrew Lustig, an American "Jewish spoken word artist" whose poetry on Jewish and Israeli identity has reached millions on YouTube and in live performances.

And there will be performances by the homegrown Dor Chadash and Yona Youth choirs, and Gray Academy's Yiddish students.

Shuster said that this year, there will be musical performances during all breaks between sessions.

Music and humour will be the focus of presentations by local chazzans Michael Eskin and Len Udow, musicians Eli Herscovitch and Phil Spevack and stand-up comic Renee Billauer.

And in another enhancement this year, Limmud participants will be able for the first time to get a discount on tickets for an upcoming presentation by the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, So, Nu?. WJT executive director Ari Weinberg will also be one of the Limmud presenters.

Including Lustig and Bender, Winnipeg Limmud will be featuring eight out-of-town presenters. One of the many headliners from this group is James Wilets. Currently a law professor at Nova Southeastern University and chair of the Inter-American Center for Human Rights, the Yale graduate and former Yale professor prepared, at the request of the UN secretary general, the first two drafts of a proposal for reforming the human rights functions of the United Nations, which was subsequently incorporated into the UN's Agenda for Peace.

He has also worked as an attorney for the International Human Rights Law Group's Rule of Law Project in Romania and worked in Paris on some of the first discussions between Israelis and Palestinians on a two-state solution. As well, while at Yale, Wilets worked with a team of academics drafting a proposed basic law for a future Palestinian state.

Other prominent out-of-town speakers include Sandra Lilienthal, a South Florida educator who was a 2015 winner of the Covenant Award for Excellence in Jewish Education; New Yorker Scott Shay, past chair of the New York federation's Commission on Jewish Identity and Renewal and the author of Getting Our Groove Back: How to Energize American Jewry; Gary Kenzer, North American executive director of Honest Reporting.com; and former Winnipeggers Benjamin Shinewald, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Bryan Borzykowski, an award-winning business journalist.

"We are trying to reach out to as many people as we can," said Shuster. "I have spoken to a number of people who have never attended Limmud because they thought it was just for religious people and Torah study. We offer something for everyone, and we have an amazing group of speakers."

Attendance last year was about 350, and Shuster and her committee hope that number will be higher this year.

Among the event's communal sponsors are the Asper Foundation (the major sponsor), the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, the Chesed Shel Emes funeral home, Congregation Etz Chayim, Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Adas Yeshurun Herzlia Synagogue and Temple Shalom. ■

Charles Bronfman winds down his philanthropic foundation

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Charles Bronfam

The Andrea & Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP) has wound up most of its operations after three decades, as had long been planned.

Birthright Israel, which it co-founded in 1998, is probably the best known of the innovative programs it supported and developed.

The New York-based charity is not entertaining any new requests for funding, and during 2016 – its final year – it's limiting its activity to meeting previous grant commitments and monitoring how grants are used.

Over its history, ACBP has given out more than $340 million (US) to some 1,820 organizations, and employs a staff of 85.

The end of ACBP, founded by Charles Bronfman and his late wife, Andrea, has been carefully choreographed and, in fact, was envisaged from the day it was founded.

In 2001, the couple, with ACBP president Jeffrey Solomon, chose 2016 as the date by which the entire endowment would be distributed. This is the year Bronfman turns 85.

In 2011, ACBP chair Bronfman and Solomon officially announced the final "spend down" over the next five years. Since then, the charity, with the outside consultants Cambridge Leadership Associations, has been working with the nine programs it operates, including Birthright, to ensure they can carry on.

Founded in 1985, ACBP (originally the Montreal-based CRB Foundation) had two main goals: to promote Canadian heritage and to "nurture the unity of the Jewish People, whose soul is in Jerusalem." ACBP would in time also encompass Keren Kerev, the Bronfmans' charitable foundation in Israel, whose goal was to improve the quality of life in that country.

The Bronfmans moved to New York in 1998. Birthright now operates independently, as, in varying degrees, the eight other programs "incubated" by ACBP do.

In Canada, these are Historica Canada, founded in 2000 and noted for its televised Heritage Minutes, and the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada in 1994.

The newest program is the U.S.-based Slingshot, started in 2005, which has the goal of nurturing the next generation of Jewish philanthropists.

Throughout its history, Bronfman Philanthropies has been hands-on in nurturing its core investments, providing not only money, but also administrative and inspirational guidance. It has always emphasized innovation and even experimentation, but has expected its beneficiaries to strive to ultimately stand on their own.

Major grant recipients in Canada included the University of Toronto's chair in Israeli studies (1997), the National Gallery of Canada (2002) for the creation of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Canadian Art Fund, and the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (2006) in Winnipeg, which opened in 2014.

The Charles Bronfman Prize was established in 2004, through an endowment from his two children, which awards $100,000 (US) each year to an outstanding Jewish humanitarian under age 50.

Among other recipients of major grants have been Brandeis University, the Brookings Institution and the Israel Museum.

One extraordinary ACBP project was The Gift of New York, a response to 9/11 that offered free cultural and sports venue entrance to families of victims.

Andrea's accidental death in 2006 gave further impetus to the ACBP's winding up. Her passing "robbed the foundation of her unique blend of focus, energy and street smarts, which so positively impacted our work," Bronfman and Solomon said in their 2011 announcement.

But the couple had years earlier realized that "their philanthropic interests were an expression of their own particular values, experiences and interests, and therefore ACBP should phase out its grant-making as they began to anticipate entering a less engaged chapter of their own lives."

They also believed that their children should be free to pursue their own philanthropic interests.

Bronfman and Solomon emphasize that the end of ACBP does not mean the end of Bronfman's philanthropy or Solomon's professional support. "We will still be active donors, but without the infrastructure and support built over the years."

He says he will carry on with his philanthropy, but "without all the overhead," and continue his interest, in particular, in Birthright. But he emphasized he won't "take on anything new, certainly nothing major. I can't afford it." He takes great pleasure in his children's "doing their own thing" in philanthropy today.

In 2012, Bronfman signed the Giving Pledge, an initiative of Bill Gates and Warren Buffett, in which the richest Americans promise to give more than half of their wealth to philanthropy during or after their lifetimes. ■

York faculty group backs campaign linked to BDS

sshefa@thecjn.ca

The York University Faculty Association (YUFA) is now one of more than 70 signatories to the YUDivest campaign, which some Jewish community groups and York faculty believe is part of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

On March 4, the YUFA stewards' council voted 23 to 10 in favour of the motion brought forth by the YUDivest Coalition, made up of groups including Amnesty International at York and Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), to urge York to divest from arms manufacturers, such as Lockheed Martin, BAE Systems, Northrop Grumman, FLIR Systems, and Textron.

Prof. Carl Ehrlich, director of York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies, resigned from the YUFA executive in light of the endorsement vote, but still serves as a YUFA departmental steward. He said that when he learned the YUDivest campaign was being considered by YUFA for endorsement, he worked on trying to inform his colleagues of the implications of supporting a motion that was effectively an offshoot of the BDS movement against Israel.

Despite Ehrlich's efforts, YUFA's executive voted 11 to 1 in favour of the motion in February, and when it was brought to the steward's council on March 4, it was officially endorsed.

"I'm very disappointed in my colleagues, I have to admit… the YUFA executive, in its motion, tried to disassociate YUDivest from the BDS movement. People in opposition to the motion think that is being either dishonest or naïve," Ehrlich said.

StandWithUs Canada also criticized the motion.

"While YUDivest does not target Israel explicitly, anti-Israel activists are deeply involved in the campaign and are using it to advance their bigoted agenda," the pro-Israel campus group said in a statement.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said that "the seemingly benign proposal to divest York from arms manufacturers is in fact a smokescreen to double down on the profound anti-Jewish hate so prevalent on the York campus."

But YUFA president Richard Wellen said that members of the stewards' council decided the motion "stands on its own merits as a general weapons divestment issue. There was agreement that it is not the role of YUFA to support BDS or take sides in any way on the Israel-Palestinian conflict."

He added: "Most participants strongly rejected the suggestion that YUFA would be supporting BDS by supporting YUDivest, as if there was a plan to enlist YUFA in an unacknowledged campaign that was really primarily about supporting anti-Israel or anti-Semitic objectives." ■

Where does Trump stand on Israel and the Jews?

BEN HARRIS
JTA

With Donald Trump sweeping to a resounding victory in seven Super Tuesday states earlier this month, Republicans awoke to the reality that the New York real estate magnate had solidified his status as the front-runner for the party nomination.

And while his candidacy has deeply unsettled many in the GOP establishment, not to mention its influential Jewish donor base, Trump has arguably the closest ties to the American Jewish community of any candidate, from his Jewish daughter and grandchildren to his deep ties to the New York business community.

Here's a rundown of Trump's major pronouncements on Jewish issues so far in the 2016 race.

Trump would remain "neutral" on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict

Even more disconcerting to Jewish Republicans than his on-again, off-again, then on-again renunciation of support from former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke is Trump's declaration that he would not choose sides in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "Let me sort of be a neutral guy," Trump said in February. Unwavering support for Israel is a critical Republican talking point in the party's perpetual (and still largely unsuccessful) efforts to sway a majority of Jewish voters from their longtime dedication to the Democrats. Trump's comments will likely make that effort more difficult for the Republicans in November.

"Do they both want to make peace?"

In December, Trump expounded on the Middle East conflict in an interview with the AP. Trump said he was interested in making a "lasting peace," and that required the commitment of both sides, something he wasn't sure existed, adding: "I have a real question as to one side in particular." He declined to specify which side that was, but some understood Trump to be questioning Israel's commitment more than the Palestinians.

Trump would not commit to recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's capital

At a Republican Jewish Coalition candidate's forum in December, Trump demurred when asked if he would recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital. In January, he appeared to shift gears when he promised to move the American embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. "We are for that 100 per cent," Trump said.

Trump likes Israel's West Bank security barrier

Trump's plan to build a wall on the southern border and get Mexico to pay for it is a set piece of his campaign stump speech. More than once, Trump has referenced Israel's separation wall in the West Bank as proof of the wall's efficacy and the hypocrisy of his opponents in criticizing it. "If you think walls don't work, all you have to do is ask Israel," Trump said at a debate in November. In January he tweeted: "Hillary Clinton said that it is OK to ban Muslims from Israel by building a WALL, but not OK to do so in the U.S. We must be vigilant!"

Trump doesn't want money from Republican Jewish bigwigs

At the RJC forum, Trump was candid that he did not want or expect support from Republican Jewish donors, but he made the point in a way that seemed to some to traffic in anti-Semitic stereotypes about shadowy Jewish control of political leaders. "You're not gonna support me because I don't want your money," Trump said. "You want to control your politicians, that's fine." Making matters worse, Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan later saluted Trump for disavowing Jewish money.

Trump thinks the Iran deal is lousy, but won't rip it up

The deal-maker extraordinaire has not minced words when it comes to President Barack Obama's handling of the Iran nuclear negotiations, saying, "Never, ever, ever in my life have I seen any transaction so incompetently negotiated as our deal with Iran and I mean never." Among his quibbles: Iran got too much money and made no commitment to release American prisoners, and inspections are insufficiently intrusive. But unlike his fellow Republicans, Trump says he would not disavow the deal on Day 1, but would be "so tough" in enforcing it. ■

'I am proud to be Jewish,' Bernie Sanders says

JTA
WASHINGTON

Bernie Sanders said being Jewish is "essential" to who he is.

Sanders was asked during the Democratic presidential debate in Flint, Mich., on March 6 about reports that Jews were disappointed that he appeared to be have downplayed his Jewishness during his campaign.

"I am very proud to be Jewish, and being Jewish is so much of what I am," Sanders, an Independent senator from Vermont, replied.

"Look, my father's family was wiped out by Hitler in the Holocaust," said Sanders, 74, who was born in Brooklyn, N.Y. and whose father immigrated to the United States from Poland.

"I know about what crazy and radical, and extremist politics mean," he said. "I learned that lesson as a tiny, tiny child when my mother would take me shopping, and we would see people working in stores who had numbers on their arms because they were in Hitler's concentration camp. I am very proud of being Jewish, and that is an essential part of who I am as a human being."

Sanders' relationship to his Jewish identity was never much of a national issue during his decades as a member of the U.S. House of Representatives and then as a senator from Vermont.

His history-making bid for the presidential nod brought the question to the fore, however, and in two earlier debate appearances he appeared to avoid raising it, even when it was clearly an issue.

Asked at a debate in February about the historic potential of his rival, Hillary Rodham Clinton, becoming the first woman president, Sanders said someone of his "background" moving into the White House would be historic as well, without specifying that he would be the first Jewish president.

Bernie Sanders

Sanders made history last month when he became the first Jewish candidate to win a nominating election, in New Hampshire.

He won handily in Maine on Sunday, the eighth contest he has won compared to Clinton's 12. She continues to lead substantially in delegates, even before the Tuesday primary in Michigan.

Sanders and Clinton agreed on much during their debate, particularly on the need for accountability in Flint, where state government decisions about water piping have led to mass contamination of the drinking water.

They clashed on other issues. On gun control, Clinton highlighted Sanders' opposition in the past to some measures. On the economy, Sanders emphasized his opposition to the 2008 bailout of the finance sector and Clinton's Wall Street ties, while Clinton honed in on Sanders' failure to fully support the Troubled Asset Relief Program that underwrote the automobile manufacturer bailout of the same year, which proved critical to protecting jobs in Michigan. And on trade, Sanders said he favoured greater protections, while Clinton defended international commerce as healthy for the U.S. economy. ■

Israelis charged in illegal Dead Sea kiosks operations

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
RICHMOND, VA.

Members of an Israeli company selling Dead Sea beauty products in shopping malls across the United States have been indicted for illegally employing 140 Israeli nationals and failing to declare their salaries to the U.S. government.

The 10 Israelis were arrested last week and charges were filed against them at a Virginia court.

Chief among the accused is American-Israeli Omer Gur-Geiger, 36, whose company Rasko operated kiosks in several states. He is charged with illegally employing Israelis who arrived in the U.S. on B-2 tourist visas, which do not allow for holders to work in the country. Gur-Geiger, a resident of Raleigh, N.C., is further accused of helping several Israelis file false applications to extend their tourist visas.

Gur-Geiger is also accused of failing to deduct tax contributions from the salaries he was paying the illegal workers, according to North Carolina's News & Observer website.

The nine other Israelis charged in the case were employed by Gur-Geiger.

Prosecutors have estimated the company's turnover over the past 5 years at $14.5 million, (all funds US) and have asked the court to collect that sum from the company's assets.

"The object of the conspiracy was for the co-conspirators to use the proceeds of their conspiracy to defraud and commit offences against the United States to transport foreign nationals on B-2 visas to the United States for the purpose of those foreign nationals on B-2 visas engaging in work, and to pay, house, and transport those foreign nationals on B-2 visas once they were in the United States," read the indictment.

The indictment charged Gur-Geiger with 34 counts of conspiracy to defraud the United States, visa fraud, encouraging and inducing illegal entry, harbouring illegal aliens, transporting illegal aliens and conspiracy to launder money, Raleigh's WRAL news site reported.

Young Israelis hawking skin care products, ostensibly made from minerals from the Dead Sea, have become a common sight in malls around the world including Canada. They grab customers passing by their kiosks and often coerce them into buying overpriced cosmetics, many in an attempt to make money as quickly as possible to fund post-army travels.

> Visa issues are likely to be just the tip of the Dead Sea industry's tax and labour issues iceberg.

But the aggressive manoeuvres used by the Israeli salespeople, coupled with the fact that many of them are working illegally, have roused the suspicions of the FBI, US Homeland Security, embassies around the world trying to combat labour fraud, and journalists who are uncovering questionable sales tactics.

In addition to aggressive and predatory sales tactics, the kiosks often skirt legal issues, evading local taxes and employing Israelis who do not have proper working permits.

A 2009 cable uncovered by Wikileaks from the American Embassy in Tel Aviv said that "In the past few years, sales of Dead Sea cosmetics and skincare products at kiosks in shopping malls across America has grown into a huge industry...A lesser-known, but problematic, aspect of the Dead Sea industry is that its personnel is comprised of many young Israelis working on tourist visas, on expired temporary work visas and on training visas. Visa issues are likely to be just the tip of the Dead Sea industry's tax and labour issues iceberg."

The leaked cable explained the process through which companies advertise online and in newspapers in Israel – promising exorbitant salaries in the range of $1,500-$3,000 per week – and coach participants how to lie in their tourist visa applications for the United States.

A Wikileaks cable from 2010 noted that few Israelis made decent money, since employers often failed to pay fair wages and there was no way to enforce that because the workers themselves were illegal. The cable noted in a few cases some Israelis actually end up in debt. "After adding in other expenses, they ended up having to pay their employer money when they left, earning nothing, contrary to what was promised," the cable stated. ■

Two rabbis from two cities and two backgrounds were brought together by a newspaper man determined to shake up the conversation. Each month these rabbis exchange ideas in writing. They delight in discovering how they agree as well as how they (respectfully) disagree.

They have never met in person. Until now! Each will bring his and her most treasured texts to challenge one another and those who come to join in the great debate of how to keep Judaism relevant in the 21st century.

All are welcome. Bring a friend.

OPINION

This is my Kotel

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman

Since Jan. 31, I have been hearing from varying media that my desire to pray, with the support of the Israeli government, at a separate area of the Kotel and the desire of the Masorti movement to no longer bear the burden, both physical and financial of supporting non-haredi worshippers, seem to border on the criminal. Over and over, I have heard that the accomplishment of a goal in allowing them to pray at a specific area of the Kotel, for which the Masorti movement has been fighting since 1997 is not an accomplishment.

Criticism has not been limited to one end of the spectrum. One haredi young man burned a Reform siddur in retaliation for the announcement. Israel's Deputy Education Minister Meir Porush said that Women of the Wall "should be thrown to the dogs." On the other side, commentaries and leaders from within liberal Jewish movements stated that the plan does not go far enough. One op-ed even suggested closing the Kotel entirely until we can all learn to pray together with no barriers. Even the Grand Mufti has gotten in on the action.

It's always difficult to accept situations that are contrary to one's own desires. In an emotional situation, it can even feel like abandonment. Nonetheless, it is not wrong for one or more groups to move ahead with goals, even when others disagree.

Norma Baumel Joseph has been vocal in The CJN about her dissatisfaction and disagreement with the recent Kotel decision. I understand. The agreement will not help her. It will not help Original Women of the Wall. But there is much more to the decision than the status of Women of the Wall.

Joseph wrote: "By accepting this plan, they are not increasing pluralism, just decreasing shared spaces." Whether de facto or de jure, the Kotel area has become a haredi synagogue. Further, the space by Robinson's Arch, known as the Masorti Kotel, has been in use for almost 20 years.

In 1997, on Shavuot, after over 15 years of Masorti worshippers holding minyanim in the Kotel plaza, haredim became violent toward the Masorti minyan, throwing glass bottles, diapers and excrement. One year later, we began holding services in the Robinson's Arch area. We officially signed an agreement with the Israeli government in 2000, "with the responsibility and readiness to reach a compromise and to dialogue, and to limit friction and confrontation which could, heaven forbid, escalate to bloodshed, we decided to accept the proposal... to hold prayers at the southern end of the Kotel, rather than in the main plaza."

Over the last 19 years, our minyanim have grown from a handful to 50,000 worshippers last year. Each day, volunteers and staff from the Masorti movement carry tables, siddurim and sifrei Torah to the area to provide for those 50,000. The Masorti movement also carries the burden of organizing, scheduling and paying for supplies. The new agreement will make this space more visible, more accessible and, in time, as familiar. It will relieve a major financial and physical burden unfairly carried, no matter how generously given. It also acknowledges the legitimacy of non-haredim to pray as they see fit at Israel's religious sites.

For many, the Kotel we see in postcards and aerial footage is the only Kotel. They ignore that worshippers pray at the Kotel HaKatan, an exposed area of the Kotel in the Arab Quarter also recognized as a holy site. Since the excavation of the Western Wall tunnels, Jews have prayed there. Since its exposure, others have also come to worship at the southern end of the Kotel. In 1967, the southern section of the Kotel was left, as the northern plaza was cleared for archeology. The digging is done. For almost 20 years, the Masorti movement has provided for these worshippers. It's time the State of Israel recognized this section as a holy site to those who chose to pray there.

The Kotel is an important symbol for Jews around the world. Its issues are multi-layered and nuanced. There are as many solutions to administering the space as there are Jews in the world, perhaps more. To Norma Baumel Joseph and others for whom this is not the Kotel, I say, it may not be your Kotel, but it is certainly mine. ■

Chief Rabbinate to offer own plan for prayer at Kotel

JTA
JERUSALEM

The Israeli Chief Rabbinate cancelled a meeting with Benjamin Netanyahu over the government's plan to expand the egalitarian prayer section at the Western Wall a day after the Rabbinate said it would create its own plan.

The meeting with the prime minister was set for last Sunday.

Hours after the meeting was cancelled, the former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel issued a rabbinic decision in which he said that setting up such a mixed-gender prayer section was equal to completely destroying the site.

On March 5 the Chief Rabbinate met with Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz, rabbi of the Western Wall, to discuss its opposition to the plan. The chief rabbis, who also consulted by phone with Israeli Attorney General Avichai Mandleblit, who brokered the deal as cabinet secretary, said their alternative will eliminate any mention of non-Orthodox streams of Judaism, the Kikar HaShabbat haredi Orthodox news website reported.

Religious Services Minister David Azoulay said recently that he would not sign off on the new regulations to establish the expanded egalitarian prayer area. On March 3, Azoulay told rabbis at a meeting that the agreement will be killed and he would not sign it, Ha'aretz reported. He reportedly was to sign the agreement just over a week ago.

"They must not be given a foothold among the people of Israel," he reportedly said of the Reform and Conservative movements.

Azoulay has called Reform Jews "a disaster for the people of Israel."

If Azoulay does not sign the regulations, Netanyahu can authorize another minister to sign them, according to Ha'aretz.

Rabbi Shlomo Amar, now the Jerusalem Sephardi chief rabbi and a former chief rabbi of Israel, ripped the plan last Sunday.

""No one can hand [the Wall] over to be disgraced and defamed, to those who pretend to pray, who act brazenly and mockingly, which is a desecration," he said, according to the Times of Israel.

Rabbi Amar added: "And it is no less serious than if they would give it over to be destroyed, its stones dismantled left and right, and razed down to its foundations, heaven forbid."

He also said the government could not make such a decision, since "no man has ownership over the site at all."

Last month, Rabbi Amar questioned the lucidity of the senior haredi Orthodox rabbis who were consulted on the historic proposal to expand the section.

"We are in agreement with Rabbi Amar's statement that no one body or person can or should have ownership over the Western Wall," the Women of the Wall group said in a statement. "Women of the Wall have long opposed the relegation of the Western Wall to the Western Wall Heritage Foundation and the sole authority of Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz over the holy site. Ideally, the Western Wall would not be divided at all, but opened up to all Jews and their traditions."

Women of the Wall has held a monthly service at the Western Wall for 25 years. Regulations at the site have allowed women to wear prayer shawls and kippot, but prevented them from using a Torah scroll in their section. ■

Most Israelis believe Jerusalem is divided, poll shows

STUART WINER
JERUSALEM

Most Israelis believe Jerusalem is a divided city rather than a unified capital, according to a poll released March 6 by the Israel Democracy Institute (IDI).

The think tank's monthly Peace Index poll found that "a clear majority of Jewish Israelis, 61 per cent, thinks Jerusalem is divided into a western and eastern city."

By comparison, when the IDI first asked that question in 1999, 49 per cent of respondents said the city was not divided, as opposed to 44 per cent who said it was.

Western Jerusalem is predominately Jewish while the city's eastern half, captured from Jordan during the 1967 Six Day War, is mostly inhabited by Arab residents.

The percentage of Israelis who see the city as divided is much higher among Israeli supporters of left-wing parties: 88.5 per cent and 85 per cent among voters of the Zionist Union and Meretz, respectively.

"Likud voters were split on the question (49 per cent for each view)," the abstract said. "Some 47 per cent of Arab Israelis think it is divided."

Concerning the motivation for Palestinian terrorist attacks, which have plagued the city since violence surged in October, most Jews responded that there was no connection between discrimination against Arabs and attacks against Israelis.

A majority of the Jewish Israeli public (57 per cent) said there was "no connection between discrimination in the areas of health, education and other services against Arab Israelis and these residents' recent involvement in attacks against Israeli Jews," the IDI reported.

By contrast, a majority of Israeli Arabs (52 per cent) disagreed and said there is a connection.

Twenty-nine Israelis and three foreign nationals have been killed in a wave of Palestinian terrorism and violence since October. Some 180 Palestinians have also been killed, about two-thirds of them while attacking Israelis, and the rest during clashes with troops, according to the Israeli army.

The vast majority of Israelis polled (90 per cent) said the IDF was operating morally to combat terrorism, and half disagreed with IDF Chief of Staff Gadi Eisenkot's recent call for restraint where possible.

The survey, conducted at the end of February, polled 600 respondents over the age of 18 and had a 4.1 per cent margin of error with 95 per cent confidence. ■

Hamas has replenished its rocket arsenal

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

Roughly a year-and-a-half after the end of Operation Protective Edge, Israeli officials believe that Hamas has replenished its rocket supply, reaching the number of rockets that it had before the operation began.

At the start of the summer 2014 conflict, Hamas had approximately 12,000 rockets of various ranges, including long-range rockets. It fired approximately 4,600 rockets during the 50-day war, and roughly 4,000 more were hit from the air in Israeli bombardments. That left the terror group with about one-third of its original arsenal.

Israeli officials now assess that Hamas has roughly the number of rockets that it had in June 2014. A major difference, though, is that most of the rockets are relatively short-range and of lower quality, the officials believe.

On the strength of the experience it gained during the war, Hamas has also been stockpiling mortar shells, which inflicted heavy damage to property and life in communities on Gaza's periphery and on IDF troops stationed around Gaza.

The new rockets are mostly locally produced – due to the closing of the tunnels that ran between Sinai and the Gaza Strip and the difficulty Hamas faces in smuggling standard rockets and weapons into Gaza. The locally made rockets are regarded as inferior, partly because smaller quantities of explosive materials are making it into Gaza due to the tunnel closures. ■

Lonsdale investments give peace of mind

Given the state of the stock market today — volatile and declining — real estate has shown itself once again to be one of the strongest asset classes in which to invest and grow your money.

But the hassle of buying an actual property isn't for everyone, which is why one of the best ways to capitalize on the returns of real estate and diversify your portfolio is to invest in a mortgage security.

"We feel that we have an advantage to the public markets as our investors don't have to worry about a stock price fluctuating. This offers peace of mind and more control over your invested dollars," says Adrian Rasekh, chief financial officer at Lonsdale Capital.

Lonsdale Capital is a boutique real estate lender that specializes in providing first and second commercial and residential mortgages to qualified borrowers in the Greater Toronto Area.

Lonsdale's management team is comprised of over 75 years of real estate experience and is led by its president, Elliott Sud, CFO Adrian Rasekh, VP Peter Tanenbaum, and Aaron Unger, former managing director of Dundee Capital Markets, who serves on the Board of Directors.

Lonsdale Capital offers investors the opportunity to invest in high-quality mortgages for properties located in downtown Toronto.

Lonsdale works with established real estate developers in the GTA and provides them with short and long-term capital for a variety of development projects, both urban mixed-use and larger scale residential projects.

Lonsdale's investment strategy has a deep focus on the downtown core. One of its first loans, for example, was a development site in the heart of Little Italy located at College and Ossington.

"We want to lend to locations that we know intimately and that our investors can relate to," Rasekh says. "Our investment strategy is to be highly selective and to only fund high quality deals."

In turn, its mandate is to preserve investors capital while also providing them with secure and attractive distributions.

"This firm has a long history of successfully investing in private and syndicated mortgages," Elliott Sud, president of Lonsdale capital says. "It has never lost a dollar of invested capital and has always met its projected returns."

A major advantage of investing in such a debt instrument is that your return is fixed based on the overall performance of the fund, which has a target yield of 8 per cent per year. The performance fee is 20 per cent of returns over 8 per cent. The management fee is just 1 per cent of size of the fund.

Along with the monthly distributions it offers, the investment is also RRSP and TFSA eligible.

"We have the ability to offer greater returns as we have lower operating costs than publicly traded companies," Rasekh says.

In addition, Lonsdale has taken the initiative to provide the utmost transparency by partnering with KPMG as its auditor and has a strong back office anchored by Clifton Blake Asset Management Ltd and CommonWealth Fund Services Ltd. and Wildeboer Dellelce LLP. ■

Investing in Israel has never been easier

Israel is setting a new standard for innovation. The country's thriving entrepreneurial spirit, exceptional workforce, intrepid culture, and resilient economy makes for an ideal environment for investors to invest their money.

Alan Blostein, vice-president at CIBC Wood Gundy, says, "Investors, whether corporate or individuals, have long seen Israel as a land of opportunity. In fact, it's not just investors who feel this way. Since the nation's founding, people from all over the world and from all walks of life have travelled to Israel to experience its unique culture and learn more about its proud history.

"We want to capture that passion and provide an investment strategy around their growing economy."

The proof is in the numbers. Over the last 20 years, the Tel Aviv Index (TASE-25 IDX) performed at a rate of 10.2 per cent compounded. Compare that to the 5.67 per cent for the S&P 500 and 4.9 per cent for the TSX. What does all this mean? Imagine you invested $250,000 in the Tel Aviv index over a 20-year period. Your investment would have grown to $1,744,102 today.

A land of opportunity, indeed!

Yet navigating Israel's business landscape can be a challenge for those who aren't familiar with the terrain. What investors need is an easy, effective way to participate in the country's economy.

Alan Blostein and Stacey Beumer, CFA, portfolio manager at CIBC Wood Gundy, saw the demand and created just that.

Thanks to the "Israel & Friends Stock Portfolio™," designed and managed by Blostein and Beumer, investors now have a simple way to take advantage of the opportunities available in Israel.

"We knew there was an opportunity to create a portfolio around investing in an Israel-focused stock investment," says Beumer. "The trouble was, there were limited options, so we decided to build our own investment strategy from scratch."

The Israel & Friends™ Stock Portfolio is comprised of 20 to 25 individual companies, half of which are based in Israel, the other half consisting of international companies with a strong footprint in Israel. This portfolio is offered exclusively through The Blostein-Beumer Investment Group. A minimum investment of $150,000 (US) is required.

The Blostein-Beumer Investment Group, with more than 40 years of providing investment advice, is well versed when it comes to understanding the thriving commerce and technology in the region. Blostein has visited Israel numerous times, and was part of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's delegation on a trade mission to Israel in 2014.

"Their young, educated, and driven workforce drives the innovation and success of their companies. It's just an incredible country," says Blostein.

Israeli companies are in demand because they are entrepreneurial, competitive, and are world leaders in technological and pharmaceutical innovation. Many multinational companies such as Nestle, Google and Microsoft have realized this. They have put their money into Israeli startups or opened research and development centres there.

In 2006, Warren Buffet, the standard-bearer for risk aversion, broke his decades-long practice of owning only U.S. companies and made a $4.5 billion investment in an Israeli company.

"The Israel and Friends™ Stock Portfolio just celebrated in first full calendar year return. The one year trailing return as of Dec. 31, 2015 was 21.7% .

If you are an investor looking to take advantage of the exciting opportunities available in Israel, look no further. The Blostein-Beumer Investment Group's Israel & Friends™ Stock Portfolio is your chance to participate in the Israeli economy.

Joining the private mortgage club

First mortgages provide investors with stable income in a volatile world.

Bonds are paying bubkes and stocks are a roller coaster. You have seen the ads touting stable income of 6%+ from investing in mortgages but with so many options and new terminology, it all seems overwhelming. Here is a brief primer to help you start investing in mortgages.

Public Fund, Private Fund or Syndicated Mortgage?

With syndicated mortgages you invest directly in one loan or a few loans. Pros include being able to pick and choose your deals. Cons include lack of diversification and a total lack of liquidity because you only get your money back when the loan is repaid. It is also more work to source syndicated mortgages to keep your money consistently invested.

Public and private funds remedy the disadvantages of syndicated mortgages. A public fund listed on a stock exchange would be diversified and liquid since you can sell the shares on the open market. However, public vehicles have higher costs and price volatility as the stock market fluctuates.

Private funds typically have lower costs and do not suffer price volatility because their price is not determined based on investor sentiment. This results in price stability but comes at the expense of liquidity. Most private funds will provide liquidity upon 1-3 months' notice, however, your money could be locked up for longer periods. Before investing in a private fund, ask if they have lockup periods with early redemption penalties. Regulatory rules allow private funds to be sold to investors who pass certain minimum asset or income thresholds. Those who are unable to pass those tests, can invest in public funds or syndicated mortgages.

Diversify to mitigate risk

Private mortgages are for borrowers who are not able to borrow at low bank rates. As a result, you should expect a certain level of delinquencies. Delinquent loans do not pay interest and, ultimately, may have to be sold at a loss. Having exposure to many loans is a great way to reduce this risk.

Pay attention to the types of loans

Loans in smaller cities generally have more risk than larger cities. Loans in geographies where the economy relies on one industry typically have more risk. Loans on vacant land are riskier than loans with buildings. Second mortgages are riskier than first mortgages because they lose money before the first mortgage. It is important to pay attention to the types of mortgages and underlying real estate in any portfolio when attempting to understand the risk.

Lending with a margin of safety

The great thing about investing in mortgages is that the loan is backed by real estate. If the borrower is unwilling or unable to pay back the loan then we can sell the property and the borrower will suffer the first loss. Our mortgage would lose if there is not enough value in the property after the borrower has suffered his/her loss. The extent of our protection is measured as the Loan-To-Value ("LTV").

LTV is the ratio of the loan relative to the value of the property. The lower the LTV the higher the margin of safety for the lender. LTVs of 75% or higher are typically thought to be higher risk.

Yield

All things being equal, the higher the yield, the higher the risk. Yield can be enhanced by lending on speculative deals with great uncertainty (think development land or high-rise condos), in riskier geographies and by using leverage. Yield is also enhanced by including more second mortgages in a portfolio. When deciding on which mortgage product to invest in, it is imperative to look deep enough to understand what risk you are taking to enjoy the enhanced yield.

The Bottom Line

We believe that private mortgages offer attractive yield for the risk taken. They generate monthly income with a reasonable expectation of return of capital. If the mortgages are managed by someone who is not trying to shoot the lights out then they can provide a nice addition to a fixed income portfolio. ■ *

The hidden costs when saving for university studies

When reviewing your education savings for your child's transition to university, the first step towards saving the necessary funds is to understand the end goal. What does your child aspire to do? Physician? Dentist? Lawyer? What is the cost of this dream? Does this involve evaluating Canadian professional school options or broadening the scope to U.S. and/or overseas options?

Have you saved enough money? Have you thought about all the costs? Tuition. Books. Living expenses. These are the costs that first come to mind. But there may be some costs that you have not considered in your calculations. Financial planning for your child's education should also include academic preparation and personal development during high school and undergraduate years.

Admission to university (especially for many professional school programs) is becoming more competitive and it is no longer just academic excellence that guarantees acceptance. The current trend for universities is a more holistic application process. In an attempt to assess a student's potential, many admissions committees are now looking at a student's entire profile, including his/her experience serving the community, as well as the types of extracurricular activities the student participates in to measure their longitudinal development. Can your child demonstrate commitment, critical thinking skills, initiative and leadership from their experiences?

Dr. Robert Astroff, President of Astroff Consultants Inc.

Access to tutors to improve grades and examination preparation services to maximize standardized test scores may be costs that need to be considered. In addition, encouraging your child to engage in activities that help him/her personally develop and create a competitive profile can give them an edge in the application process, and will ultimately provide experience, skill development and abilities that will assist them long after their university education is complete.

Beyond the mandatory volunteer hours in high school, encourage your child to participate in activities that offer opportunities for development. There are a broad range of organizations that can provide personal enrichment to make students more attractive university candidates. From overnight camps, volunteer and paid work, international experience (e.g. Magen David Adom and the March of the Living) to local community service, there are numerous opportunities that can build a student's profile. However, support for these activities often requires financial commitment from parents.

Not being accepted on a student's first try to a competitive university program also has financial impacts for both you and your child. Besides potentially financially supporting your child as they wait to apply the next year, it is also another year that they will not be establishing themselves in their career and earning money within their chosen profession. Gap years are becoming more common amongst students who are not accepted on their first attempt, but this time should be used carefully as an opportunity for further growth and development. Choose meaningful experiences to boost personal development to improve the chances of success in the following application cycle.

Having an academic plan in place, along with a financial plan for your future educational endeavours will help place your child on the path for a bright future. ■

Accounting for success in Toronto

While you might think that the world of financial statements, audits and tax isn't exciting, you haven't been working with our team! In this article, we'll share a few Toronto success stories – each an example of how Stern Cohen delivers value and preserves our clients' money.

Maybe Taxes are Not Always Certain

For any taxpayer, ensuring they pay their fair share (and no more) is paramount. To that end, we're ever vigilant on our clients' behalf. In one example reported in the Toronto Star, Stern Cohen Partner Lorne Lebow discovered his client was eligible for a $12,000 rebate on the HST the client paid for home care services for his mother. It was an obscure exemption but Stern Cohen was recognized for bringing it to light and securing a significant refund for our client.

In another case, Stern Cohen Managing Partner Michael McCleave recognized that a technical change introduced by the Canada Revenue Agency for a limited time and without much hoopla could enable some substantial refunds. Michael took the time to determine if any of Stern Cohen's clients qualified. Some did. The result: refunds for between $93,000 and $158,000. Vigilance pays.

Michael McCleave, CPA, CA, LPA, Richard Mendelsohn, CPA, CA, Ph.D and Lorne Lebow, CPA, CA, MSc. Three of Stern Cohen's seven-strong Partner team.

It's Your Business – Get Advice Today that Your Future Self Will Thank You For

As advisory specialists for owner-managed businesses, Stern Cohen has supported generations of family and private-ly-held businesses operating in Canada and internationally. Business owner transition can be devastating if the necessary planning is not carried out 3 to 5 years in advance of retirement (anything less than 18 months can be problematic).

In one example, a client with a thriving business found himself without a succession plan since his children had embarked upon different careers. As a Stern Cohen client, the business owner had ready access to a team of advisors who proactively designed and implemented a succession plan well in advance of his retirement. The plan included a valuation relating to goodwill and real estate, estate planning, a family trust, a profit sharing plan for the new owner and a pension for the retiring owner.

When all was said and done, the original business owner received full value of his business with a pension. The new business owner (also a Stern Cohen client) is now a wealthy person with an established business. ■

Jazz video shows you how to 'Clap on the 2 and the 4'

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Not everyone knows how to clap to jazz, so singer Ori Dagan aims to show them how in his latest release, Clap on the 2 and the 4.

The video features Dagan singing his original composition while his friends and fans of all ages, some with their pets, dance and clap to the music.

The song is about feeling the swing rhythm of jazz. "In other forms of music, pop music and especially classical, when you clap to the beat, you clap on the one and three. In jazz, the emphasis is on the second and fourth beat," he said.

While he was writing the song, he imagined Ella Fitzgerald singing it. Dagan taught himself the basics of scatting from listening to Fitzgerald. "Sometimes when I'm writing a song I try to imagine some of my inspirations singing it. This is one of the pieces where I could imagine Ella singing the song," he said. "She probably had the greatest sense of swing in terms of singing with jazz feeling. To me, she is the reason I sing this music."

In the video set in downtown Toronto, shots of Dagan singing and dancing, often surrounded by brightly coloured bits of animated text, are combined with footage of adults and children clapping and dancing, sometimes with birds, dogs and even a horse.

> I absolutely love teaching people about jazz singing.

Aside from helping audiences find the rhythm of jazz, the video is also about how jazz brings audiences together, he said.

Once Dagan had the idea for his video, he contacted friends and fans from around the world and asked them to submit videos of themselves clapping and dancing to the song. "The kids and fans added their own take on it. Some of them were really creative, choreographing a dance," he said.

The video features two of Dagan's well-known friends, Canadian fashion icon Jeanne Beker and one of his favourite singers, Alex Pangman, who claps along with her horse in a segment. At writing, the January 2016 release had more than 80,000 hits on YouTube.

Recorded with saxophonist Alison Young, pianist Scott Metcalfe, bassist Jordan O'Connor and drummer Lowell Whitty, Clap on the 2 and the 4 is the first original song Dagan has released as a single.

Until recently, Dagan, named the best jazz vocals winner at the 2015 Toronto Independent Music Awards, has been known mainly as a singer of other people's songs rather than his own material. "I still love doing covers. But I think there's a lot to be said for putting something new in the world," he reflected. "There's definitely something that compels me to be a songwriter, so that's what I'm focusing on."

Half of the tunes on Dagan's upcoming third album, a tribute to Nat King Cole to be released this fall, will be Dagan's originals, inspired by Cole's life and legacy, while the other half will consist of tunes Cole made famous. "I'm in awe of the complete range of his musical talent," Dagan said.

Along with songwriting, recording and performing, Dagan books some 40 jazz shows a month at the 120 Diner in downtown Toronto, and he writes a monthly column called Jazz in the Clubs for the music publication The Whole Note.

He's on the faculty of the Summer Institute for Creative Adults, with singers Micah Barnes, Adreana Braun, Shannon Butcher and other artists. The institute holds a five-day summer vocal camp for adults at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"I absolutely love teaching people about jazz singing," Dagan said. "I had a class where I was teaching senior citizens to sing the blues. It brought so much joy to people and it really stayed with me, so I'm really excited to be back at the JCC in July."

Clap on the 2 and the 4 (on YouTube) will be screened at 6:15 p.m. on March 14 at the Toronto Short Film Festival at the Carlton Cinema. ■

On 50 years of Woody Allen

Michael Fraiman

Name a director who's been making feature films for half a century. Seriously, try it. King Vidor may hold the Guinness World Record for the longest directing career – 67 years, from a silent short in 1913 to a short documentary in 1980 – but only 40 of those years were spent on full-length movies. Neither Stanley Kubrick nor Alfred Hitchcock, two of history's greatest and longest-serving filmmakers, surpassed 46 years.

So it's worth acknowledging that, in the spring of 1966, almost 50 years ago, Woody Allen was putting the finishing touches on What's Up, Tiger Lily?, his first feature-length film. For context, Allen, 80 – currently working on a new comedy film and TV series for Amazon – debuted as a director the same year that both Star Trek and Batman premiered on television.

What's more impressive than the length of Allen's career, however, is its almost literary consistency. The progress of Allen's filmography is the progress of culture and film itself, and by returning to his first film, 50 years on, one can retrospectively see the inevitable development of both.

Tiger Lily is a weird directorial debut, in that Allen doesn't direct much at all. It's a silly dub-over of a 1965 Japanese spy movie, swapping the original soundtrack and dialogue for tunes by The Lovin' Spoonful and Jewish one-liners. So instead of understanding the original story – about a plot to steal cash from anti-government guerrillas – we're watching a Japanese man named Phil Moskowitz search for the world's best egg salad recipe.

Re-watching Tiger Lily today (which you can do on YouTube) reveals a lot about Allen's formula, which hasn't changed much in 50 years. Like virtually all his films, it's both timeless and dated; while The Lovin' Spoonful bits (allegedly added by studio executives afterward to Allen's great disgust) rip modern moviegoers from the moment and remind them exactly in what decade the movie was made, the best gags defy age entirely. They're wordless jokes that can't be transcribed – men excitedly sniggering while peeping through a keyhole, talking about Miracle Whip or feeding a chicken to a cobra.

It feels very much like a first film, an 80-minute experiment that tests the boundaries of a one-dimensional concept. That naiveté indicates both the mentality of 1960s cinema and the humour of a boyishly goofy 30-year-old Allen.

Of course, we all know where Allen's career has gone, from these early sketch-comedy years to his cinematic zenith in the late 1970s and '80s, a decline through the '90s and settlement into whatever he is now—a cultural icon maligned by societal outrage whose movies are, with a few exceptions, pleasantly predictable and predictably pleasant.

But if you connect those dots back 50 years, it's all there in Tiger Lily – that bizarre juxtaposition between a nebbish man and sexier women; his experimentation with the film medium; misplaced Yiddishisms ("a salad so delicious you could plotz"); jokes revealing sexual inadequacy and quiet desperation; his self-aware cameos, wherein he addresses us, a reminder that we're still just watching a movie, his movie.

The hidden value of silly entertainment has recurred as a theme throughout Allen's career; it literally saves his life in Hannah and Her Sisters. But he's always been hesitant to define that value as anything more than accepting the randomness of life. The action in Tiger Lily pauses at one point, cutting to Allen sitting next to an interviewer, who asks, "Woody, because the story is a little bit difficult to follow, would you give the audience and myself a brief rundown of what's gone on so far?" Allen, deadpan, stares directly into the camera, and replies, "No." It's never been his job to explain anything—his job is simply to make us laugh. ■

Playwright is first Canadian to win prestigious Yale award

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Hannah Moscovitch won Yale's Windham-Campbell prize.

What would you do with $150,000 (US)?

For playwright Hannah Moscovitch, that question's now a reality because she just won one of the Donald Windham-Sandy M. Campbell Literature Prizes.

Yale University announced the nine massive prizes on Feb. 29 this year, awarding artists who "have left their mark on the world of literature and theatre or have been judged by their peers as exceedingly likely to do so."

Moscovitch, an Ottawa native, is now the first Canadian woman and first Canadian playwright to get a Windham-Campbell, a prize Yale established in 2013. But when she found out, she didn't believe it right away.

"My son was asleep on my lap – he's eight months old. I listened to the audio-file sent to my phone as a message and I thought it was telemarketing," she says, noting how it sounded like one of those pre-recorded "you've just won a free cruise!" calls.

"I nearly didn't respond. And I called them and I asked them if it was real," she continues with a laugh.

She didn't even know she was up for a prize because the whole Windham-Campbell process is rather secretive.

After receiving that fateful voicemail, she learned Toronto's Tarragon Theatre – where she's the playwright-in-residence – and Alberta Theatre Projects in Calgary both nominated her for the award.

But despite the thrill of winning, she's not sure exactly what she's going to do with her unrestricted grant yet.

"I do think it means I'll work on projects on my bucket list," she says. And that may include writing a play based on the Jewish gangsters who ruled Montreal back in the 1920s and '30s.

Before she does that though, her latest play, Bunny, will premiere at the Stratford Festival this summer, and in January 2017, Tarragon will remount her Dora Mavor Moore award-winning show, Infinity.

Off-stage, Moscovitch writes for CBC's World War II spy thriller X Company – Season 2 is airing now.

Moscovitch, who's currently based in Halifax, has received multiple Dora Awards and is the first playwright ever to win a prestigious Trillium Book Award.

Her most recent accolade will be a huge help as she continues to move forward in her career.

"It does make a big difference if you're a freelancer and you don't know where money and work are coming from," she says. This prize is a sort of safety net. "It means I'll be less afraid, and I hope that means my work will be stronger." ■

CHAT grad dream becomes reality with Maple Leafs

Zach Hyman takes to the ice with the Maple Leafs.

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Zach Hyman recalls the phone conversation as if it happened just a week ago – which of course, it did. It was on a Sunday afternoon when he received the call telling him to come to the Air Canada Centre the next morning for a pre-game skate.

That's a skate with the Toronto Maple Leafs, it should be noted, not with the AHL's Toronto Marlies, with whom he'd been playing all season.

"It was a really cool phone call," Hyman recounted. "It's something you've been dreaming about your whole life."

Like countless other Canadian kids, Hyman grew up playing hockey and dreaming of playing in the NHL. Of course, only a very small number ever get to live the dream, so Hyman and the three other Marlies call-ups were joining some very select company, indeed.

"I felt more excited than nervous," he said of the actual game-day.

He and his Marlies buddies, including centre William Nylander, were called upon to take the opening faceoff against the Tampa Bay Lightning's Filppula line, backed up by defenceman Victor Hedman.

Welcome to the NHL, kid.

"It felt good," Hyman said of playing on the opening and not having to wait to be called upon on the bench.

Up in the stands, besides the diehard fans of Leafs Nation, were the charter members of the Hyman fan club. His parents, brothers and other family members were present, as were plenty of friends.

With the first two tickets provided by the Leafs, he set up his girlfriend, whom he met while attending the Anne and Max Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and her mother. Another pair of tickets went to one of his former teachers at TanebaumCHAT, Jory Vernon, who's a vice-principal at the school now.

"When I was in high school, I made a promise to my American history teacher at the time [Vernon], that at my first game in the ACC, he'd be there," Hyman recounted.

When Hyman signed a pro contract with the Leafs last summer, Vernon reminded him of his high school promise.

With the Leafs out of the playoffs and the team embracing a youth movement, there's a good chance Hyman and the other young guns will get a good long look for the rest of the season.

He's performed pretty well in his first few games. The stat line from the Tampa Bay game reads zero goals and assists, even on the plus/minus scale, two shots on goal, one hit and 15:58 in ice time – pretty respectable numbers for a rookie, let alone someone playing their first game in the NHL. Games two through four were pretty similar, with Hyman earning about 15 minutes of ice time a night and being defensively responsible – even on the plus/minus scale.

Hockey Night in Canada made special mention of his ability to carry the puck into the offensive zone, rather than simply dumping it in.

So far, the transition from the AHL to the NHL has been "awesome," Hyman said. "It's fast" but he believes the speed suits his game. His line mate with the Leafs is Nylander, no slouch in the speed and skill department, and last year with the University of Michigan Wolverines, one of his line mates was Dylan Larkin, a speedster who isn't doing too badly with the Detroit Red Wings.

Although his NHL adventure is only a few games old, Hyman has been feeling more comfortable all the time. "I've giving 100 per cent every time I'm on the ice," he said.

Maple Leafs' no-nonsense coach Mike Babcock has noticed. Following the Lightning game, Babcock said, "Hyman is a relentless worker who can still make plays."

After a road game in Washington, he said, "I thought Hyman and [Nikita Soshnikov] were real good."

And following last weekend's game at home versus the Senators, he said, "I thought Hyman, Soshnikov and Nylander were all real good for us."

Hyman has been real good at hockey ever since he was a boy. At an early age, he developed the mindset that would allow him to continue to take the steps from one level to another, and set for himself "goals within goals."

As a youngster, he wanted to be the best player in AAA hockey. Later he aimed to play NCAA college hockey. Once at Michigan, it was becoming an All-American, something he attained in his last year, when he was also in the running for the prestigious Hobey Baker Award, scoring 54 points in 37 games as a senior.

Hyman continues to set goals for himself – the ultimate one is to win the Stanley Cup.

In the meantime, there are those goals within goals to attain, at the heart of which is "to try to be the best that I can be." ■

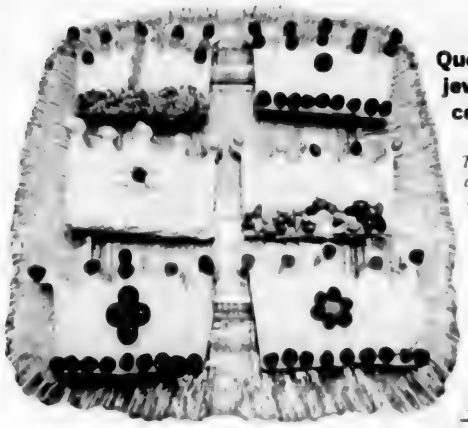
Treats recall Queen Esther, a woman worthy of her crown



RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Purim is carnival time. Decorum is tossed out the synagogue window and surprises are the rule of the day. We are encouraged to dress up in colourful costumes and masks. Children in particular enjoy dressing up as the characters in the Book of Esther. Children also enjoy delicious Purim treats and colourful crafts. This year, blend the two together: take your children into the kitchen for a hands-on adventure. Spend holiday time with them while creating inventive and colourful treats to celebrate Queen Esther and all that she did for the Jewish People.

Queen Esther's jewelled crown cookies

These amusing cookies are great for kids of all ages. Entertaining to decorate and delightful to eat! Use a crown-shaped cookie cutter, or design your own crowns.

- ❑ 1 cup butter, softened
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups sugar
- ❑ 2 large eggs
- ❑ 1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
- ❑ *1 tsp. pure almond extract
- ❑ 3 cups all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ pinch of salt
- ❑ 1/2 cup icing sugar
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. water
- ❑ edible jewels: your choice of jelly beans, M&M's, course sugar crystals, silver dragées, assorted sprinkles, sugar pearls, candy covered sunflower seeds or cinnamon hearts *optional, but almond extract gives the cookies an amazing boost of flavour.

In food processor, beat butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add in eggs, vanilla and extract until mixed. Combine flour, baking powder and salt just until blended, occasionally scraping bowl with rubber spatula. Divide dough into four equal pieces and flatten each piece into a disk. Wrap each disk in plastic wrap and refrigerate at least one hour or as long as overnight.

Prepare 2 or more cookie sheets with parchment paper. Preheat oven to 350.

Remove one piece of dough from refrigerator. On lightly floured surface, with floured rolling pin, roll dough to 1/4-in. thick. With floured cookie cutter, cut dough into as many cookies as possible. Place cookies carefully onto parchment paper. Bake until edges are golden, 12 to 15 minutes, rotating cookie sheets between upper and lower oven racks halfway through.

Place cookie sheets over a wire rack to cool. Repeat with remaining dough.

When cookies are cool, mix icing sugar with vanilla and water to make an icing paste. Use paste to fasten candies to decorate the cookies. Set cookies aside to allow icing paste to dry completely, about 1 hour. Store in tightly covered container with parchment paper between layers.

Depending on the size of the cookie cutter, recipe makes 12 to 16 cookies.

Jewelled crackle

Crackle is all the rage, showing up everywhere, made from all types of ingredients. Here is a fun crackle recipe to prepare for Purim, or any other time you wish.

- ❑ 1 cup butter
- ❑ 1 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 2 cups pretzels, mini, twisted style
- ❑ 1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
- ❑ 1 cup M&Ms or similar candy

Line a baking sheet, including sides, with parchment paper. Set oven to 350.

In a heavy saucepan, melt butter over medium heat and add brown sugar. Stir well with a whisk until sugar is dissolved. Continue cooking and stirring with the whisk until the mixture starts to look like toffee, about 3 minutes. Line the pretzels in rows on the parchment, then drizzle the mixture over the pretzels. Evenly sprinkle the chocolate chips over the mixture, and place in oven for 1 minute. Chocolate chips will hold their shape but become glossy. Using an offset spatula, spread the melted chocolate evenly over the mixture. Sprinkle the M&Ms evenly over the chocolate. Cool mixture in the refrigerator until set, approximately 1 hour. Break the crackle apart into cookie-size pieces and keep refrigerated until serving.

Jewelled crown dessert

You will feel a twinge of nostalgia when you prepare this elegant Purim dessert. It is a blast from the past, an oldie, but a goodie! And it is worth bringing back. It is based on an ancient Jell-O dessert that many of us enjoyed as kids and your family will love now. Either prepare it as I suggest, in a crown shaped pie shell, or serve in a clear bowl, a trifle dish or in individual fruit nappies.

Crown Pie Shell

- ❑ 2 cups all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 2/3 cup cold unsalted butter
- ❑ 1 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 1 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ 4 to 6 tbsp. cold water
- ❑ 9-in. spring form pan

Combine flour and salt in food processor or bowl then pulse or combine in butter, pure vanilla and one tbsp. sugar until mixture resembles coarse crumbs. Add in water just until flour is moistened and forms a ball. Divide dough in half and shape each half into a disc. Flatten slightly. Wrap each disc in plastic wrap and refrigerate for 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 450. Roll each ball of dough on lightly floured surface into a 12-inch circle. Place one circle in the spring form pan, pressing firmly against bottom and sides. The second circle will be cut with a sharp knife into zig zags around the outside of the circle. Then cut a second circle about 1 in. below the zig zag pattern, cut the zig zagged section into two pieces and carefully attach them up the sides of the pan so the zig zag pattern stands just above the crust.

Press down at the seams to make it secure. Using a fork, make prick marks all along the bottom of the pan and up the sides. Bake for10-12 minutes or until it is golden brown. Cool.

Filling

- ❑ 1 package orange gelatin
- ❑ 1 package cherry gelatin
- ❑ 1 package lime gelatin
- ❑ 1 package grape gelatin
- ❑ 1 package lemon gelatin
- ❑ 1/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 cup boiling water
- ❑ 1/2 cup pineapple juice
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups Cool Whip

Dissolve package of orange gelatin in 1 cup boiling water. Add 1/2 cup cold water. Place gelatin in a shallow 9x9-inch individual baking dish. Repeat with cherry, lime and grape gelatin. (There should be four different pans.) Place in refrigerator to set 4 hours or overnight.

When a book (and a book review) is also a fan letter

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some of us are in the Bruno Schulz business. As devotees, we pine for the discovery of his manuscripts that were lost in the wartime. We follow websites dedicated to his writing and illustrations. Sometimes we even daydream of visiting Drohobycz, the Galician hometown, now in the Ukraine, where Schulz lived and wrote.

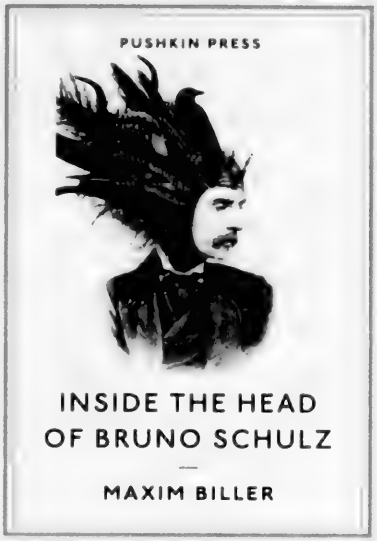
Then there are the writers who build their own fictional worlds around Schulz's life and writing: David Grossman; Jonathan Safran Foer; Nicole Krauss; Cynthia Ozick. Are they up to the task, or is their undertaking a bit like James Joyce's son trying to write a novel about Dublin? Upon reading their efforts one turns back to Schulz himself – his two slim volumes called Cinnamon Shops (1934) and Sanatorium Under the Sign of the Hourglass (1937) – to breathe a sigh of relief upon returning to the Real Thing.

New to the company of Schulzian devotees is the Prague-born, Berlin-based Maxim Biller. Biller's Inside the Head of Bruno Schulz is a unique addition to the catalogue of books by Schulz devotees. Published by the Pushkin Press in London, it is a lovely thing to hold in your hand, a tiny, beautifully made book that points back to the independent handmade books of the Bloomsbury era.

Inside the Head of Bruno Schulz contains three things: Biller's long short story, a surreal portrait of Schulz at work in a basement room, circa 1938; and two pieces from Schulz's Cinnamon Shops, including the masterpiece that bears the book's title and is a kind of blueprint for his fictional oeuvre. These are in the original 1960s translation from the Polish by Celina Wieniewska.

For newcomers to Schulz this is an attractive offering. A bit of the master supplemented and introduced by one of his recent devotees.

What does Biller make of Schulz? Certainly, something strange. In this case, the devotee comes to the master via another devotee. Biller's Schulz seems to be partly inspired by the American animation team the Brothers Quay. Their film based on Schulz's Cinnamon Shops is a grotesquerie of faltering puppets, collapsing machinery, and cabinets of curiousity full of hairballs and skittering insects.



Inside the Head of Bruno Schulz
By Maxim Biller.

Pushkin Press

Biller places his reader "inside the head of Bruno Schulz" in a Drohobycz basement, where Schulz writes under a "dirty skylight" that offers a voyeuristic view of "shoes and legs . . . umbrella tips and skirt hems of passersby up above in Florianska Street." Here we meet Schulz the fetishist, who is more evident in the author's cliché verre etchings, where he presents, again and again, the image of men worshipping women.

Biller's Schulz writes a letter to the German novelist Thomas Mann. Schulz in fact did this, in an effort to gain Mann's support for his German-language story The Homecoming.

The narrative twist in Inside the Head of Bruno Schulz is the appearance in Drohobycz of an impostor, a German who impersonates Mann, lords over the town's Poles and Jews, while cutting a secret deal with a Gestapo informant who seeks "a written list of all the Jews in town . . . their addresses and a brief assessment of their physical strength and financial circumstances."

In 1938 Drohobycz was in the last throes of an oil boom, and it appears, from Schulz's letters, that he was warned by a friend about the overtures of a German spy who was making grandiose promises about German language publication of his work.

Based on this anecdote Biller creates an extended set piece in which a bathroom in a Hapsburg era hotel is transformed into a torture chamber, which is evocative, not so much of wartime experience as of previous artistic attempts to explore the German penchant for domination. These include Lina Wertmüller's 1975 movie Seven Beauties and Leonard Cohen's second novel Beautiful Losers.

> Inside the Head of Bruno Schulz is a unique addition to the catalogue of books by Schulz devotees.

The more devoted one gets to Schulz, the tougher the detective work, the more aware one becomes of contemporary artists pushing his oeuvre in new directions. Biller's story confirms the talismanic qualities of Schulz's work and life, and his ongoing capability to motivate others to create strange new things.

Drohobycz, in the heart of still-troubled Ukraine, beckons to the Schulzian devotee. One finds oneself up, late at night, furtively checking ticket prices to Lviv, and wondering about the reliability of hotel offerings on Florianska Street. ■

Sisters invite you to bite into their newest cookbook

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The combined genius of two sisters, Julie Albert and Lisa Gnat (also known as the Bite Me sisters) has provided a culinary platform for everyone stepping into the kitchen arena.

Albert and Gnat are set to launch their third cookbook, Lick Your Plate, published by Random House, on March 29.

Lick Your Plate offers 160 original recipes, several 30-minute dinner ideas, tips, tricks, mouthwatering visuals, funny anecdotes, drool-worthy descriptions of every recipe, and is perfect for everyone from the beginner to the well-seasoned home cook.

"Our goal is to get people across the country licking their plate. It's going to be the go-to cookbook for easy week- night meals, entertaining ideas, and for bringing friends and family together in a stress-free way," said Albert.

Albert, armed with a masters of journalism from Ryerson University, and Gnat having earned her pastry papers at George Brown, have co-authored bestselling cookbooks Bite Me and Bite Me Too.

"Our cookbooks are our babies, and we have the stretch marks to prove it," laughed Albert.

"When we write our books, we really aim to create accessible recipes that set people up for success.

"We have put so much love and thought into creating a resource for people who really just want to get into the kitchen, or who are spending a lot of time in the kitchen looking for fun and answers to what's for dinner," said Albert.

Lick Your Plate is eye candy with a fresh aesthetic that aims to inspire people, thanks to the sisters' skills. It is all about fresh ingredients to bring out flavours without adding fat.

"Everything is real food. All the soups are creamy – but there is no cream in them. With our world-famous candy-topped challah bread, our brisket, our sour cream coffee cake, and our falafel salad, there are many recipes that speak to our Jewish roots," said Albert.

"There are many books out there telling you how to eat. We serve up the recipes, and they can each be adapted accordingly to your own personal lifestyle," added Gnat.

Gnat's passion for cooking began when she was a child.

"I would be with my mom in the kitchen all the time," Gnat said. "She showed me the love of creating, cooking, and bringing family together."

Albert added, "Lisa was a killer with her Easy-Bake oven. She had all the neighbourhood lined up. She was ruthless, selling cakes at 10 cents for one, and two for 25 cents."

Cooking doesn't need to be intimidating, and nothing needs to be perfect.

"I just sat and watched. Lisa has fed me from the beginning. When I had a family of my own, noodles with butter weren't really going to cut it anymore. I turned to Lisa, and she really taught me how to cook. Her recipes work. I feel extremely lucky to get to work with my best friend.

"I really admire what Lisa does and Lisa tolerates what I do," said Albert.

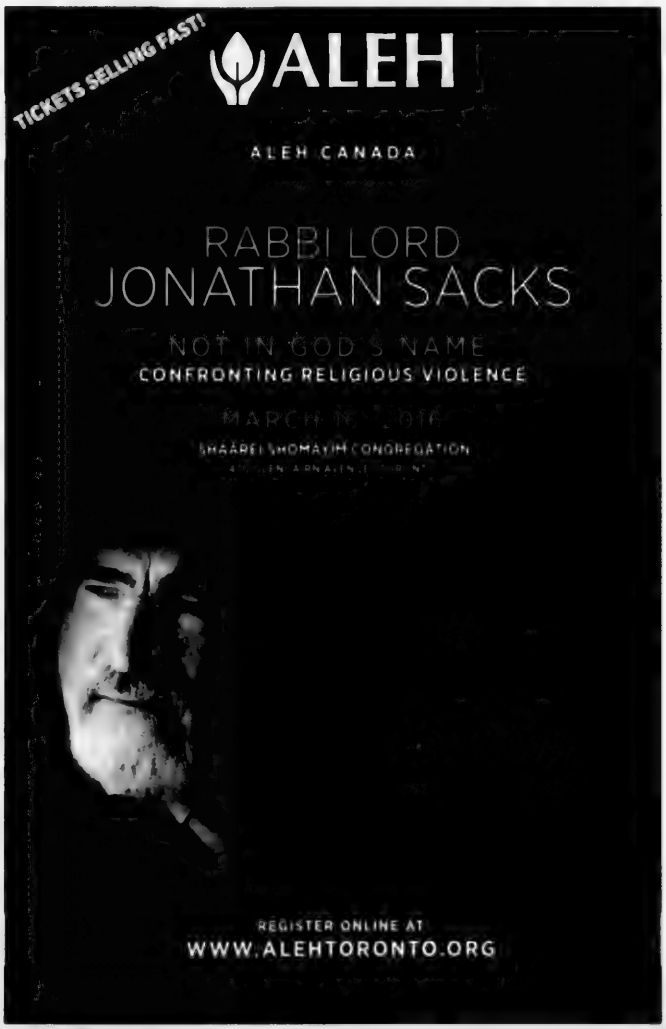
Asked what is it that sets Lick Your Plate apart from other cookbooks, Albert said that it is, "The mash up: the combination of fool-proof recipes with the fun factor."

Lick Your Plate has attracted a broad and diverse range of endorsements from people such as chef Michael Smith; musician Jon Bon Jovi; food critic Gail Simmons; astronaut Chris Hadfield; founder, chair and CEO of Indigo Heather Reisman, and actor Jason Alexander.

"Jason Alexander – a.k.a. George Costanza from the TV series Seinfeld – wrote something menschy and quite hilarious," said Albert.

"I've always had a fantasy about sisters....cooking for me. Lisa and Julie make it come true. I love to eat. I love great food. I love these girls. I ate this book," wrote Alexander.

Lick Your Plate will be available for purchase at www.bitememore.com, Amazon, Indigo and other bookstores. ■



SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Metal implants and travel

Dr. Michael Gordon

Many older patients of mine have metal implants in their limbs following some form of reconstructive surgery. It is the age of the bionic person. With so many "snowbirds" and with security metal detectors almost everywhere, there is often an expressed concern about whether having a metal implant in the hip or knee might delay you or lead to problems when you pass through airport or cruise security metal detectors.

I recently had a comparable experience when flying, which I do quite often. I had acquired a MedicAlert bracelet, which also is a common accoutrement of many older patients. As I passed through the security arch having already removed all my usual triggers (phone, wallet, belt, watch), the alarm went off – I realized that the MedicAlert bracelet, whose clasp is such that it is very difficult to open, clearly for safety reasons, was the culprit. I mentioned it to the agent – who took his wand and clearly identified the source of the alarm, and when he finished the rest of the scan, he let me through without any problems.

I was curious and perused the medical literature on the subject, given the high prevalence of seniors with metal in their bodies – part of the contemporary miracle of modern medicine. I recall a time when severe knee and hip arthritis left seniors either completely immobilized or chronically racked by significant, often life-altering pain.

It is not that the surgery is "easy," and it's not always successful, but for many, it can have a dramatic and long-lasting beneficial effect. No less important than the surgery itself is that there seems to be a very flexible ceiling on age – with some very elderly individuals found suitable for surgery – depending on what other medical conditions exist.

Many of the articles that discuss the issue remark on a practice in the past, when patients with metal hardware in their bodies often provided the security agents with letters or cards attesting to their condition. However, it is now felt that these are not needed nor heeded, as there is no way of verifying the veracity of the author – and the backup metal detector or full body scan will do the trick more effectively and assuredly.

> Novel treatments that, although life enhancing or life saving may cause some modicum of inconvenience at the security gate when people travel.

What most of the articles on the subject suggest is that the traveller should alert the security agent right up front about the issue rather than waiting for the detector to go off. I thought of having the clasp on my MedicAlert bracelet changed to one that could be more readily opened and closed but decided that the security of a bracelet that could not readily inadvertently fall off was more important than the minor inconvenience of a manual security scan.

Some things, we often say, just "come with the territory." Travel has become more complicated because of issues of security. There is no doubt that the recent tragic bombing of a passenger plane in the Middle East will result in either more intense scrutiny of travellers or some new directives on screening – just when things seemed to be easing up in North American airports.

Medicine has become more complicated because of novel treatments that, although life enhancing or life saving (such an internal heart pacemaker which also has metal wires), may cause some modicum of inconvenience at the security gate when people travel.

This seems to be a small price to pay to achieve both desirable ends – being able to walk unattended through a security gate after restorative surgery, and making sure that fellow travellers are safe in their travels.

Still, during those years when I was studying medicine all this would have been in the realm of wild imagination. ■

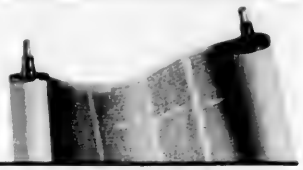
Pekudei | Exodus 38:21-40:38



Yacov Fruchter considers the reasons some people go to shul, and what keeps others away
Rabbi Shalom Spira examines why the rabbis instituted 18 blessings in the Amidah prayer
Rachael Turkienicz observes that creating holy spaces can be a delicate and intricate affair

Yacov Fruchter

"Moses could not enter the Tent of Meeting because the cloud rested upon it and the glory of the Lord filled the Mishkan" (Exodus, 40:35).

The purpose of building the Mishkan was to create connection with God, a physical space for meeting with the Divine. Yet, the gathering point for the Children of Israel, the point of intersection with the Divine, was inaccessible to the Jewish People when the "glory of God" was also present – even Moses could not enter.

From a literal reading of the text, it seems that God's presence is the barrier. One way the rabbis have explained this is to distinguish between the cloud itself and God's presence. The Torat Kohanim, quoted by Rashi, suggests that when the cloud lifted, Moses was able to enter and talk to God. What then is the role of the cloud? Is it to create an aura of spirituality and a sense of formality?

In my work, I have spent a great deal of time considering why some people go to shul and what keeps others away. For many young people, there is a stigma around going into "religious" places. Most synagogues offer much more than prayer services and religious exploration, yet the religious connection tends to keep people out.

Some prefer to avoid conversations about or with God, wherever they take place, while others are happy to experience prayer in less traditional spaces. For those who are searching for spirituality and looking for meaningful prayer, is it possible that the traditional synagogues are perceived as shrouded in a "cloud" and not available when needed?

It's time to remove this stigma of inaccessibility. If you haven't been to a synagogue lately, I challenge you to check out the vibrancy of these places. I know you will find a community waiting to embrace you, and perhaps even an encounter with the divine. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

The Talmud Yerushalmi, Berakhot 4:3, offers several reasons why the Men of the Great Assembly instituted 18 blessings in the Amidah. One of these is that Parshat Mishkan Sheni ("the portion of the Second Tabernacle") contains 18 affirmations that the Sanctuary was completed as the Holy One, blessed be He, commanded Moses. The Yerushalmi continues that a 19th, similar sounding expression is found in Exodus, 38:22, but is not reckoned.

Rabbi Moshe Margaliyot, in Pnei Mosheh, explains that Mishkan Sheni is a codename for Pekudei, because the opening verse contains the word "Mishkan" twice in succession. Offering a variation on this theme, Rabbi Shlomo Siriliyo posits that Mishkan Sheni refers to each Jew, who is expected to make him/herself into "a second Tabernacle" by reciting the Amidah with devotion.

Why is Exodus, 38:22, not counted? Rabbi Siriliyo answers that it already has an independent meaning, as recounted by the Gemara, Berakhot 55a. It is that Bezalel correctly intuited that the edifice should be built before the utensils, even though he orally received reverse instructions.

Rabbi Velvel Soloveitchik, in his commentary to the Pentateuch, similarly writes that the instructions showcased by Pekudei are those that apply for perpetuity. Presumably, Reb Velvel means to distinguish Exodus 38:22 on the grounds that the architectural sequence which Bezalel accurately deciphered was a once-in-history phenomenon.

Of interest to the HIV research enterprise is the eighth Amidah benediction, which paraphrases Jeremiah, 17:14, in asking for a medical recovery. This imbues us with a sense of appreciation. Although we are obligated to use the scientific ability at our disposal to extend patients' lives (particularly as underscored by the Agudath Israel of America's newly inaugurated resource on the topic at chayimaruchim.com), we recognize that whatever success we ultimately achieve is only thanks to the Holy One, blessed be He. ■

The Torah portion Pekudei presents the building of the Tabernacle and the Divine Presence resting upon it. Details are listed, measurements and a full accounting of materials. In the end, the People of Israel, following God's instructions, create the first Jewish area of holy space.

This is no minor feat. The last time these people tried to create holy space was at Mount Sinai when they made the Golden Calf and brought about the worst covenantal betrayal of our history.

So, teaching us how to create holy space is a delicate and intricate affair. At first, we learn that it starts with an artistic vision. This moves to gathering donations. The language of construction is the language of building relationships.

Martin Buber commented that the description of the Tabernacle is parallel to that of Creation. He said building holy space is like building a new universe. But the beginning of the world was wrought with arguments, conflict and tension. Interestingly, when we try to build holy space today, we are often enmeshed with the negative side of the parallel – the political arguments, the fundraising conflicts, the design disputes and the elevated tensions. Sometimes these can be built right into the stone and brick, and instead of creating holy space, we create a place of disharmony and separation.

The name of the portion, Pekudei, means "the numbers." Yet, the same word is used in Genesis to refer to Divine memory. God remembers Sarah and she is given a child. It is a crucial lesson in understanding how holy space must connect with our memories of meaning and priority. If building a synagogue only relates to our bottom line, we are only building walls.

We built places of betrayal and places of ultimate holiness in our history. We are reminded that a space is holy because of what it connects with and not because of the amount of gold collected. ■

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach divinely intervenes in Canada

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Shmuley Boteach, the American Orthodox rabbi and television personality famous for his frank discussions of sex and relationships, became something of a household name for his former reality series Shalom in the Home, which ran on the network TLC for two seasons in 2006-2007. Rabbi Boteach is now host of a new talk show, Divine Intervention, which premiered Feb. 22 on the Canadian network VisionTV and runs for 18 episodes. The show features the rabbi engaged in counselling sessions with individuals and couples, addressing subjects ranging from infidelity to parenting to sexless marriages.

How does Divine Intervention differ from Shalom in the Home?
Firstly, Canadians and Americans are really different. Americans are generally more open, less self-conscious and will speak more candidly about their problems. But the flip side is they may not always be as reflective. The people I was counselling in Canada had already put a lot of time and energy into thinking through their problems before coming to me, which made for very interesting shows. We could go deeper and get to the heart of the problems more quickly.

The premise of the show is that you provide counselling. What are your credentials to do so?
I think I have credentials that are time-honoured and tested. It's called being a rabbi. A rabbi's principal occupation was, historically, counselling, and I've been counselling people since I was 20 years old. I have thousands of years of Jewish values and tradition to guide me, which is what I employ in my counselling.

What percentage of the guests that appeared on Divine Intervention was not Jewish?
I don't quite know because we purposely don't ask people their ethnicity or religion. It's only come up if it was relevant to the person's issue. The Jewishness in the show lies in the host, not in the guests.

Why do non-Jews seek therapy from a rabbi?
I don't think they're coming to get counselling from a rabbi but from me. I've been a counsellor and an author and a broadcaster for a quarter of a century. A lot of people know what I represent. I think many are coming to me despite my being a rabbi, not because of it. All religious leaders – rabbis, pastors and imams – today in the west are becoming increasingly marginal, so a religious personality has to convince people they have wisdom. I think people come to me because they believe I have answers. And these answers do come from Judaism. I take my Jewish identity very seriously.

What sorts of problems did guests come in with?
Adultery and infidelity were very common. People are bored in their marriages. I don't think cheating happens to create pain, but because people are looking for something exciting. I think women feel neglected by their husbands, and when a new man shows them attention, they feel seduced – this is something I saw on both of my shows. Another common issue I saw was female depression, especially that of housewives. Women are more susceptible now to depression than ever before. They're achieving near parity in education and employment, yet women today seem to be incredibly unhappy. There are skyrocketing rates of female alcoholism and pill-popping.

A lot of my shows feature women who have no reason to be unhappy: they're in loving relationships and have kids. My own diagnosis is I think there's an incredible assault on women in western society. They're expected to be almost perfect. They're not allowed to age or gain weight. They live with a permanent sense of inadequacy. They can never look good enough or run a household and have a job perfectly enough. It's tough to be a woman. Men are judged according to one criterion only: how successful they are. But with women it's also how are you aging? What kind of wife or mother are you? The top "sins" for women are these two very natural things: aging and eating. Something's got to change.

How are you able to help them?
The difference between Christianity and Judaism is that Christians believe in the existence of a perfect being, but Jews believe in struggling beings. Our Bible is replete with flawed beings – like our forefathers, like Moses. The lesson I convey to people in my counselling is not to judge yourself by standards of perfection like Jesus, but by the standards of struggle, to ask yourself, "Am I in the fight?" It's why Oprah was so comforting to women in America. She talked about hating exercise, and she didn't look perfect. Israel means "he who wrestles with God." We need to forgive ourselves for being flawed.

You've never experienced being a woman, yet you talk a lot about these problems you maintain are particular to women. Can you speak to that?
I think every counsellor is limited by their own experiences and identity. We all have to accept the limitations of our identity, but extrapolate beyond that and do our best to be empathetic. Your question presupposes that we're not capable of empathy. We can never enter someone else's soul, but we can find shared human experience. Women are my core audience – my publicist says they're 60 per cent of my viewers – and I get their feedback. They tell me if what I'm saying resonates with their experiences or not.

You're an Orthodox rabbi. Do the problems people bring you ever conflict with your Torah values – for example, when counselling people who are homosexual?
We had two shows on homosexuality. I'm Orthodox. I have a gay brother. I've been immersed in this issue since I was 17. I've written thousands of pages about Judaism and sexuality.

I think Judaism takes the wisest approach to homosexuality that is current in society: Judaism makes homosexual sex a sin, but it also makes lighting a candle on the Sabbath a sin. I tell gay men all the time, "There are 613 mitzvot. You have 611 left to fulfil. That'll keep you busy." It's not a zero-sum game. Let gay men and women keep as many mitzvot as they can. But to judge them by one criterion and make them less Jewish or special or close to God as anyone else, that's an abomination.

Do you support same-sex marriage then?
I believe in civil unions for all and marriage for none. Marriage is the most intimate commitment people can make, and I have no idea why the U.S. Congress or, here, Parliament should be involved. Gay couples should have all the civil and financial rights as non-gay people. But marriage should be between a rabbi and the couple. As a rabbi, I'm Orthodox, so I don't perform gay marriages. I'm close to many gay couples, though, many of whom I counsel and regularly have at my Shabbat table.

Do you believe you've made Judaism more accessible to people as a result of your shows?
Many people have said, "Wow, how do I become a Jew?" I absolutely believe I make Judaism more accessible. My life's work has been to make Judaism a light unto the nations.

Your ideas about marriage and sex typically frame the man as seducer, while the women is desperate to feel wanted or chosen by the man. How do you respond to the critique that your philosophy about relationships is outdated?
My response is we all want to be desirable. You may say it's outdated. I say, show me whatever works. If people believe they have solutions that work better, let them promote those.

I don't believe my way is the only way, although, for those who dismiss what they call old-fashioned, maybe they need to take a closer look at our society. The world as a whole is progressing, yes. We're doing better macrocosmically, but microcosmically, we still have something like a 50 per cent divorce rate. In the United States, we have a prescription drug problem. So maybe it's time to look closer at things people consider solutions.

I'm interested in whatever works that's based on a moral and ethical foundation. ■

Glueckel of Hameln

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some aspects of Jewish life have been constant through the ages. Just as we are today preoccupied with making a living, raising a family and ensuring our children succeed, so too was Glueckel of Hameln (in Hebrew, Glikl). Born in 1646 near Hamburg, Germany, she was not only a wife and mother of 14 children (two of whom died at young ages), but also a business partner to her husband Chaim and continued working after his death.

This is all the more remarkable in that Glueckel lived in an era when most German Jews were discriminated against. They were subjected to a wide-range of restrictions that affected every aspect of their daily lives – where they could live, which streets they could walk on, even when they could marry. They faced heavy and humiliating taxes, including the leibzoll or body tax.

Every Jew – the exception were wealthy Jewish merchants, or "Court Jews," who provided important financing to rulers– who passed through a city, town or village was required to pay this toll, a demeaning charge that was not eliminated in the German states until the end of the 18th century. At the gates of Mainz, for instance, custom officials greeted visitors with a sign for duties to be paid under the following headings: "Honey, Hops, Wood, Jews, Chalk, Cheese [and] Charcoal." Jews were still victims of what years earlier was sarcastically called a "sponge policy": they "were allowed to absorb the money required by the rulers, which was then squeezed from them by varying degrees of pressure."

Glueckel wrote of such problems in her memoirs. Soon after Chaim had died in 1689, she began writing her diary in Judisch-Deutsch, a German dialect written in Hebrew that eventually evolved into Yiddish. Her writing was initially a self-reflection, as she noted, to "stifle and banish the melancholic thoughts which came... during many sleepless nights." Later transformed into a manuscript by one of her sons, it was eventually published in German in 1911 and then translated into English in a 1932 edition.

Glueckel had been betrothed by her parents when she was only 12 years old to the son of Joseph Baruch, a prominent gems dealer from the town of Hameln in Hanover. They were married two years later. For the next three decades, Glueckel worked side-by-side with Chaim, who was, like his father, a trader in gold, silver, pearls and money. Chaim traveled throughout Europe, while Glueckel looked after their many children as well as kept tabs on his contracts and account books. As a trader at fairs in Leipzig and Frankfurt, Chaim moved in a circle that brought him into contact with the wealthiest Jews of the age.

Still for much of their lives together, Glueckel and Chaim were always worried about the many bills they owed and worked diligently at arranging marriages for their children that included large dowries. One of Glueckel's proudest moments was when her eldest daughter, Zipporah, married Kossman Gomperz, the son of a distinguished Jewish family in the duchy of Cleves. Attending the ceremony and celebrations were young Prince Frederick (the future King Frederick I of Prussia) and Prince Moritz von Nassau. "For a hundred years," wrote Glueckel, "no Jew had such a high honour."

Chaim's death naturally paralyzed her for a time. She believed that he had died because of her sins. But she still had eight children at home to take care of and took solace in the trust that her husband placed in her. Before Chaim died, he said, "I have no instructions. My wife, she knows everything. Let her do as she has done until now."

Glueckel did just that. She expanded the gem-trading business and opened her own shop. Worried, however, that she would fail and become a burden to her children, she remarried. Her second husband, a widower Cerf (Hirsch) Levy of Metz, France, was a banker and community stalwart. Yet soon after their marriage, his business failed. He lost his money as well as much of Glueckel's. She lived with her daughter, Esther, in Metz and spent the next 12 years surrounded by her children and grandchildren until her death in 1724 at 78. ■

Oscar winner learns about his roots, and honouring a heroic cyclist

An emotional genealogy lesson

Dustin Hoffman didn't even know the names of his paternal grandparents when he appeared last week on the PBS show Finding Your Roots With Henry Louis Gates. But after learning of his family's tragic past and how his great-grandmother survived a Russian concentration camp to come to America, the Oscar-winning actor broke down in tears. Gates showed him Libba Hoffman's Ellis Island records, which said she'd battled health issues, such as losing an arm and poor vision, to arrive at age 62. "This is the hero of your family tree," Gates said. Hearing that, Hoffman couldn't hold back his emotions. "People ask me today, 'What are you?' I say, 'I'm a Jew,'" he said, struggling through tears. "They all survived for me to be here."

Dustin Hoffman breaks down in tears.

Israeli team pays tribute to Bartali

Israel's pro cycling team will cover the route Italian champion cyclist Gino Bartali took secretly in World War II to save Jews escaping from Nazi persecution. The March 20 ride by the team will begin in Florence, Bartali's native town, and finish in Assisi. Recognized as a Righteous Among the Nations in 2013, Bartali is one of the most popular cyclists of all time. He won the Tour de France twice, as well as the Italian Giro d'Italia multi-stage race three times. "Bartali, who was a courier for the Resistance, came to play an important role in the rescue of Jews within the network initiated by [Archbishop Elia Angelo] Dalla Costa and Rabbi Nathan Cassuto," Yad Vashem says on its website. Bartali, who covered large distances while training, transferred forged documents hidden in the handlebars and seat of his bike. He also hid a Jewish family in his apartment.

Actor explains why he won't play Mercury

British actor Sacha Baron Cohen says he quit the planned biopic of flamboyant Queen lead singer Freddie Mercury because surviving band members wanted "to protect their legacy." Baron Cohen told radio host Howard Stern that Mercury would have died halfway through the film, and the rest of it would have depicted how Queen carried on without him. That would have made it "less interesting of a movie," said the star of Borat, Bruno and the The Brothers Grimsby. ■

Counting our chickens

When I read the front page of The CJN March 3, and noticed the headlines "The cost of keeping kosher" and "Where are all the kosher chickens?", I had to send in my response straight away.

Anyone who wants to keep kosher always knows they will have to pay more. And most are and are still willing to do so. Therefore, when I go to the meat counter, I shop carefully and try to buy what I truly need for the week. I am careful to make sure there is very little waste.

What really has made me angry over time, however, and especially, since Marvid has had the monopoly to supply all of the chickens in Toronto, is that when I bring home my packaged chicken, I feel that I have been gouged twice over.

First, because the prices have gone up quite considerably, and I really don't think that it's all due to the dollar exchange rate. Second, and most important to me, is that when I open the package, I have to deal with removing all of the fat and extra skin that are left on each piece before I can use them for cooking. When I have finished removing all of this from each piece, or from a whole chicken, I am left with a handful of extra weight that I had paid for to be thrown out in the garbage.

It seems to me that there is no control on how kosher meats and products are really priced. It is truly sad to read that there are some people who say that they only can afford to buy kosher for Shabbat or the holidays. Instead of encouraging people who want to keep kosher, these companies seem to only care about their bottom line. And for me, when I am opening up a nice package of chicken legs, or what have you, and have to then throw away the extra fat, after paying the price of wanting to keep kosher, it makes me just want to scream.

Miriam Abbou

I am saddened by the bureaucratic foot-dragging of the Chicken Farmers of Ontario on your community's chronic need for safe, great-tasting, nutritious, affordable, locally produced, kosher chickens.

Small Flock Poultry Farmers of Canada was approached by one of the kosher chicken proponents, and we attempted to aid them in understanding the issues, and proposed solutions.

One possible solution discussed was to consider small flock poultry farmers and pastured poultry. If you start with an inferior chicken, the world's best kosher processing plant can't make it much better than the mediocrity of the bird's upbringing. The scientific evidence contrasting the "factory chicken" from "pastured small flocks" is significant and reliable.

There are only 1,400 or so chicken factories in Ontario, but there are more than 16,000 small flock poultry farmers. Small flockers would like to be a part of the solution for your kosher chicken. Let a small flocker near you understand and help.

Celebrate instead of tolerate

How interesting that you chose the headline "Tolerating differences among Jews" (March 10) to highlight the difference of opinion between Rabbi Daniel Korobkin and Rabbi Lisa Grushcow, regarding how traditional and liberal Jews treat one another.

It was Rabbi Korobkin's use of that word "tolerant" that is actually quite upsetting. On the surface, it sounds like an admirable quality to possess. But how does it sound if we talk about being tolerant of women, or tolerant of gay people? It now sounds like a very condescending attitude. There is a hidden implication that our views are correct, but everyone else who is different is quite wrong, and we will "tolerate" them.

Perhaps a better choice of a word, which would reflect the attitude someone is trying to convey, would be to say we are "accepting" of different forms of Judaism, or perhaps even "celebrating" the different forms.

This attitude would be no different than how we look at different forms of music. Although we have our favourites, we don't just tolerate other kinds of music. We celebrate the different kinds, and our world is enriched because of the many varieties. How wonderful it would be if all factions of Jews could "celebrate" one another's views instead of just "tolerating" them.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Is it OK to get drunk on Purim?

There's a role for alcohol or drugs in the Jewish religious experience, but we can create a joyous atmosphere without turning to mind-altering substances

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: As Purim approaches, I think of a story Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach would tell about a rabbi who walked around wishing people a "kosher Purim" and a "happy Passover." Someone pointed out to him that he must be confused, for Purim is connected to happiness and Passover is associated with kashrut.

The rabbi responded: "On Passover, we become so obsessed with ensuring our homes are kosher that we often forget to rejoice. On Purim, we sometimes get carried away with rejoicing, so we need to remember to keep our behaviour kosher!"

I recall Purims before I entered the rabbinate that were marked by excessive drinking. I am proud to say that this is not the case at my synagogue's Purim celebrations. However, in some parts of our community, religiously sanctioned alcoholism is a major problem, and it's not only relegated to Purim.

Have you encountered this in your experience, and have you seen any efforts to maintain a joyous atmosphere without instinctively turning to the bottle?

Rabbi Cutler: I am very conscious of the way alcohol is presented at my shul, whether during Purim, kiddush or other moments. Yet, I am also aware of teenagers who may choose to go to other synagogues on Purim or Simchat Torah because of perceived easy access to alcohol.

Those who feel compelled to imbibe on Purim to the point of no longer being able to distinguish between the cursed Haman and the blessed Mordechai should study the many modern responsa on the topic, including one by my teacher Rabbi David Golinkin, which advocate drinking before going to bed and allowing the alcohol to serve as a sleep-inducer. Once asleep, one can certainly no longer distinguish between Haman and Mordechai.

Drinking on Purim, it strikes me, addresses two demands. The first is a desire on this most joyful of days to increase our happiness by any means necessary, including through inebriation. The second, on a holiday that marks our near annihilation and notes the thin line between salvation and destruction, drinking can serve as a coping mechanism, a means of escape from the brutal realities of life, if only for one day a year. Such an approach to alcohol may be understandable on a very small scale, but transforms into alcohol dependency if engaged in more regularly.

Meanwhile, a team out of Johns Hopkins University is currently recruiting rabbis to participate in a study on the spiritual effects of psilocybin, a psychedelic substance found in some mushrooms. Is there a legitimate role for alcohol or drugs in the Jewish religious experience?

Rabbi Scheier: The problem of alcoholism in the Jewish community neither begins nor ends with Purim. A few years ago, a major Jewish organization issued a statement discouraging Shabbat morning kiddush clubs – not because of the alcohol dependency issues, but because the gentlemen who participated in the drinking would then go home, fall asleep at the Shabbat table, and miss out on important family time.

While we avoid extremism with most actions, alcohol undoubtedly plays a role in the mature Jewish experience. Wine, for example, is imbibed at essentially every Jewish ceremony and festival. Our responsibility, in my view, is not to present alcohol as an evil. Instead, it is to teach how to live holy lives, which involves education and moderation. At the same time, we must be vigilant to ensure that laws concerning minors and alcohol consumption are respected in our houses of worship.

How, in your view, does one teach or model this moderation?

Rabbi Cutler: With words and with actions.

Occasionally, someone will bring a bottle of scotch to weekday breakfast at the shul. Since I don't think it especially appropriate to consume alcohol at one's place of employment – especially at 8:15 a.m. – my position is that at breakfast, I will only drink liquor that is older than me.

I am also acutely aware that there are recovering alcoholics who regularly attend synagogue events and I'm mindful of the commandment not to put a stumbling block in front of the blind. When alcohol is served, non-alcoholic alternatives must be present. Additionally, I think it generally unwise to include an alcoholic beverage in the name of a synagogue program, as if consumption of said beverage is an intrinsic part of the experience, which – barring beer or scotch tasting – it rarely is. ■

Iran's latest provocation

"Israel should be wiped from the pages of history." Those were the words reportedly scrawled on two ballistic missiles launched by Iran last week in tests Tehran confirmed were designed to "confront the Zionist regime."

Add this latest public threat against Israel to a growing list of hostile acts by Iran in recent months, including the successful firing of new ballistic missiles in October 2015, an act many argued employed technology banned by the United Nations Security Council; the launch in late December 2015 of rockets near American warships; and the seizure in January by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards of two U.S. Navy vessels and 10 crew members, after the boats accidentally entered Iranian waters.

One week later, the Iranian nuclear deal went into effect, and now, less than two months after the deal's implementation, more aggression.

In the days since the most recent launch, some world leaders have floated the possibility of new, or renewed, sanctions against Iran. U.S. presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton called for sanctions, joining a significant number of American politicians, both Democrats and Republicans. The Obama administration, meanwhile, has said thus far only that it is investigating the incident, while the French government offered that sanctions could be implemented "if necessary." For its part, the Canadian government, which reduced sanctions against Iran in February, has not said much of anything.

Strictly speaking, last week's launch did not breach the nuclear deal signed last year, but that should hardly matter. If anything, this latest round of bellicosity from Tehran should prove the fundamental problems with that deal. And besides, if Iran has breached a UN resolution, then it should be called out and punished, regardless of whether doing so might endanger a nuclear deal some world leaders are clearly counting on being a major part of their political legacies.

And yet, days after the launch, there has been no concrete action, leading to the questions: how far will Iran go before the world, Canada included, responds meaningfully? And can Israel wait that long?

Last week, I had the honour of seeing one of my first successful shidduchim in action when rabbis Yael Splansky and Mark Fishman gathered at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto for the inaugural Rabbi 2 Rabbi Live event (for more, see page 15).

When we set out to redesign The CJN, one of our first projects was to identify eight rabbis to participate in weekly conversations about religion and Jewish life in a new feature called Rabbi 2 Rabbi. The rabbis were organized into four pairs, each of which, we hoped, would bridge gaps – denominational, geographic, political, age and gender – in the Jewish world. Nearly 100 columns in, I'd like to think Rabbi 2 Rabbi has made a difference.

Each duo has chosen its own approach to Rabbi 2 Rabbi. As they explained at Holy Blossom, for Rabbis Fishman and Splansky the goal has been to focus on the things their respective communities – modern Orthodox and Reform – share, and to engage in Jewish learning in chevrutah to build bridges. The fruits of their effort are certainly evident, and I hope last Thursday's event helps set the stage for more Rabbi 2 Rabbi Live gatherings in the future. ■ — YONI

MEMOIR

Torontonian recalls his 'parallel' Holocaust story

Frances Kraft

Jerry Blitzer was born in Poland in 1929 and spent his early years growing up in a comparatively well-to-do family in Kolbuszowa, a small town in central Poland. His father, part owner of a lumber mill and a flour mill, employed 120 people before the war.

Blitzer lost 31 family members in the Holocaust, among them his sister, three grandparents, aunts, uncles and first cousins. But he calls his survival a "parallel" Holocaust story because it happened "alongside" the Holocaust. Blitzer and his parents were among more than a quarter of a million people whose lives were unintentionally saved by Soviet leader Josef Stalin. They endured their own hardships in Siberia, unaware of the Holocaust that was taking place at home.

At the urging of Blitzer's adult children, he wrote a book about his experience, called Through Ten Time Zones. In 2014, he printed 125 copies of the hardcover, 118-page volume for friends and family.

The book was edited by Farla Klaiman, a freelance editor who now works for the Azrieli Foundation. To the best of Blitzer's knowledge, there isn't another full-length memoir that reflects his experience.

Klaiman said that while she's not familiar with every Holocaust memoir, there probably aren't many about survivors who ended up in Siberia. She noted that it was not Blitzer's choice to leave his home – he saw his town divided, and he saw many people die. "He was definitely affected by the Holocaust, both personally and in terms of his extended family."

She added that she was struck by Blitzer's sense of humour and his openness to learning and taking advantage of new opportunities after his education was interrupted at a young age.

Jerry Blitzer sits in front of plaques in his home that testify to his community involvement.

> People can't believe that I remember everything.

In 1940, Blitzer and his parents were living in Sambor, in the Soviet-occupied part of Poland, and they were sent to Siberia for refusing to become Soviet citizens. Blitzer's younger sister had been left in the German-occupied area with her grandparents.

Blitzer's mother had intended to return to her parents the same day she took her son to his father, one of many Jewish men who had fled east to avoid being sent to German labour camps. The crossing, at a border that was supposed to be open, didn't go as planned. Mother and son endured a harrowing river crossing on foot and spent two days in jail before they were reunited with Blitzer's father.

The trio was sent on an arduous journey in overcrowded trains with no toilets. They travelled beyond Irkutsk to an old Siberian mining town that Blitzer described in the book as "thousands of kilometres and 10 time zones away from home, " where temperatures would dip as low as -60 C.

Isolated for the duration of the war, the displaced group of which Blitzer was a part refused to believe the stories they eventually heard about the fate of friends, family and an unfathomable number of other Jews who had been killed by the Nazis. At first, they thought the stories were propaganda.

Blitzer, who speaks seven languages, had a piecemeal education during as well as after the war, when he lived with relatives in Paris, then Antwerp.

In Paris, he attended the ORT school, which offered a combination of vocational and regular classes, and in Belgium, he became a diamond cutter and studied Jewish texts with a rabbi. Private English lessons that he had taken earlier proved useful when he moved to New York, where he lived for 15 years and became co-owner of a luncheonette.

In 1965, he and his wife, Fila, moved with their children to Toronto, where Jerry joined his brother-in-law in the lumber business.

Now a grandfather of six, Blitzer retired at age 61 to devote himself to community work. Plaques, certificates and letters of appreciation testify to his dedication to organizations including Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (now Jewish Free Loan Toronto), Jewish National Fund, State of Israel Bonds and B'nai Brith Canada.

He has been a frequent traveller to Israel, and went back to Poland with his wife in 1975, before such visits were common.

"People can't believe that I remember everything," Blitzer said, referring to the number of details he included in the book. On his visit to Poland in 1975, he directed a taxi driver to his grandfather's house, recalling landmarks that he used to see when he visited every summer as a child.

He would encourage other survivors whose lives "were parallel to the Holocaust" to write about their experiences too. ■

The battle to eradicate genetic diseases

Expanded testing is good news for the Jewish community, but it's still too early to declare victory over Tay-Sachs and other afflictions

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

Jacob Schwartz was just a few weeks old when his parents noticed something was wrong. His eyes didn't seem to track, and he was having difficulty holding his head up.

Within a few months, they received the devastating diagnosis that their first-born child had Canavan disease, a fatal, incurable genetic disorder.

Adding to the family's anguish was the knowledge that in the United States, Canavan was among the genetic diseases that were part of the standard screening for Ashkenazi Jewish couples. At the time, 1997, in Canada, Jews were only being routinely tested for Tay-Sachs, the most common of the genetic diseases identified in the Ashkenazi Jewish population.

Jacob, now 18, has lived far longer than was ever expected, but his mother Ellen lists the things he can't do. He can't see, eat or move, and suffers from severe scoliosis. Recently, the family learned his disease has "severely progressed."

"I love Jacob with my heart and soul. He's changed my life for the better, but his life is very difficult, and he struggles so greatly," she said.

"I'm so grateful he's here. Knowing I'm going to lose him is quite devastating."

Not long after learning about Jacob's prognosis, Ellen and her husband Jeff, along with National Council of Jewish Women Canada (NCJWC), began lobbying to have provincial health care plans offer and cover a wider range of genetic tests, and to expand the community's awareness of testing.

The Schwartz family's foundation, Jacob's Ladder, has raised almost $3 million for awareness about genetic testing, research and therapy programs.

Today, in Canada, seven genetic diseases are on the standard testing panel for Ashkenazi Jews. All the diseases are recessive, meaning both parents must be carriers to have an affected child.

Jews of Sephardi background are advised to be screened for Tay-Sachs and thalassemia, according to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Lorraine Berk, chairperson of Jewish genetic diseases project for NCJWC, recalls the first mass screening for genetic diseases NCJWC organized in 2001 attracted about 300 people.

Initially, NCJWC volunteers across the country focused on educating doctors and rabbis, professionals who would see young couples, about the need for genetic testing.

Now, as testing becomes one more routine task at the doctor's or midwife's office, NCJWC organizes fewer large screenings. However, every few years, it sponsors one and every time, even when just 40 to 60 people come out, carriers are discovered, Berk said. About one person in 30 in the Ashkenazi Jewish community is a carrier for Tay-Sachs, the most common of the genetic diseases.

For Schwartz, genetic testing has become paramount. "We celebrate every day he [Jacob] is alive," she said. "But would I knowingly bring someone into the world who is going to suffer? I don't think I would do that."

In many ways, expanded testing and awareness has been an unheralded good-news story.

While no numbers are available, Dr. David Chitayat, head of the prenatal diagnosis and medical genetics program at Mount Sinai, said the incidence of babies born with Tay-Sachs to Jewish parents in Ontario is very low, because of testing. Most Tay-Sachs babies today are born to non-Jewish parents.

At the National Tay-Sachs and Allied Diseases Association in Boston, executive director Sue Kahn said the group once saw about 100 Jewish children born with Tay-Sachs annually. Today, the association – which also represents Canadians, since the Canadian branch closed several years ago – sees five or fewer. But it's too early to declare a victory, she cautioned.

"Some people say Tay-Sachs has been eradicated. It makes us crazy," Kahn said.

Children are still being born with the disease, because intermarried Jewish couples and their physicians don't see a need for testing, when in fact, Tay-Sachs is prevalent in other ethnic groups, such as French Canadians. (The association is currently involved in a study looking at the incidence of Tay-Sachs in the Irish population in the United States.)

On occasion, children conceived using untested donor eggs or sperm can also have the genetic disease, Kahn said.

There is also a risk of complacency. Unlike the large-scale efforts to eradicate infectious diseases, genetic testing is an ongoing process. Some people assume that because there is no family history of disease, they are unaffected. However, because these diseases are recessive, there is still a risk, Kahn said.

She also hears people say their mother was screened, so they don't need screening, not realizing that many more diseases have been identified since Tay-Sachs screening began.

For ultra-Orthodox families, where arranged marriages are the norm and strict halachic rules about family planning apply, genetic screening takes on a different complexion.

Dor Yeshorim, an organization started by a rabbi who lost four children to Tay-Sachs, screens thousands of haredi young people in North America, Europe and Israel annually.

In Toronto and Montreal, a representative from the New York-based group visits annually and tests Grade 12 students in girls' high schools and boys' yeshivas. In Toronto, about 300 young people are tested annually for nine fatal or debilitating recessive genetic diseases, said Marianna Dyman, the Toronto representative for the organization.

A similar number of teens are tested in Montreal, said a Montreal spokesperson, who did not want to give her name. In fact, few people would enter a shidduch without first consulting Dor Yeshorim, she said.

But in an age when consumers seek to know everything about their health, Dor Yeshorim's results are cloaked in secrecy, so that individuals don't know if they are carriers of a recessive gene or which disease it is. Those tested receive only an identifying number.

Matchmakers call Dor Yeshorim with the identification numbers for a proposed couple, and the introduction only takes place if the two numbers are cleared.

"The person who is a carrier is not sick," said Dyman explaining the confidentiality policy. "But for some people, maybe those who are less educated, that would carry a stigma for that person."

Since the organization started, about 400,000 individuals have been screened, and about 1 in 100 matches are incompatible, or as a letter from founder Rabbi Yosef Ekstein in Dor Yeshorim's newsletter states, "sparing over 4,200 families the horror of losing children."

Dyman says it's a privilege to assist in the screening program. "It's quite beautiful to remove the sorrow from the family. It's such a mitzvah." ■

CIJA among groups pushing for law against genetic discrimination

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

Canada is the only G7 nation that does not have legislation that protects individuals from having their own genetic information used against them by employers or the insurance industry.

It's a cause that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has thrown its weight behind, primarily because a number of genetic mutations and illnesses have been identified first in the Jewish population.

All three political parties support the idea in principal and said so during the recent federal election campaign, said Richard Marceau, general counsel and senior government adviser for CIJA.

Getting actual legislation passed, however, is a much slower process. A bill sponsored by Liberal Sen. Jim Cowan is back in committee for a second time, with a second round of hearings now being scheduled.

A bill sponsored by the Conservatives in the House of Commons died when the election was called last year.

CIJA has joined forces with a number of disease-focused groups to ensure that Canadians cannot be compelled to submit to genetic testing or reveal information, as a condition of employment or to get insurance, Marceau said.

It's becoming an increasingly urgent problem, he said. Thirteen years ago, there were genetic tests for 100 diseases. Today there are more than 32,000.

"As we move toward personalized medicine and more widespread genetic testing, we would not want that advance in medicine to have the flipside of causing people to have trouble with insurance or with employment," Marceau said.

During the first round of hearings in the Senate in 2014, medical experts testified that patients had turned down genetic testing because they were concerned they or their children could be denied life insurance or long-term disability coverage.

While the insurance industry said that this type of legislation would make insurance costlier and more problematic, in the G7 nations and Israel, which have instituted genetic non-discrimination laws, there has not been an issue, Marceau said. ■

BDS: bullying, demonization and slander

Gil Troy

On Jan. 31, 1961, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Yaacov Herzog, 39, visited McGill University to debate famed 71-year-old British historian, Arnold Toynbee. Five days earlier, while lecturing at McGill, Toynbee had denied Israel's right to exist while unfairly comparing Israelis to Nazis. In the ensuing debate, the older historian ultimately disavowed his comparison, while the Israeli diplomat eloquently defended the rights of Jews, like all peoples, to a homeland. Fifty-five years later, McGill's students produced another righteous do-over, refusing to ratify an unfair, insulting student union resolution targeting Israel.

The 512 McGill students who supported the BDS movement – pushing for boycotts, divestments, and sanctions – disrespected democracy, trying to impose this destructive resolution for a third time in 18 months. In championing boycotts, they undermined bridge-builders who seek Israeli-Palestinian dialogue. In endorsing divestment, they encourage extremists and reward terrorism, further poisoning the atmosphere. In applauding sanctions, they failed to understand that the more you want Israeli territorial concessions and peace-processing, the less you should support demonizing boycotts. And in bullying Israel, they voted to make thousands of pro-Israel and Jewish students uncomfortable: on a campus that abhors micro-aggressions against women, blacks and LGBTQ students, they injected offensive anti-Semitism-laced macro-aggressions.

The BDS movement is dishonest. While it claims "only" to oppose Israeli settlement in the West Bank, its founding document opposes Israel's existence. Falsely claiming, in the original 2005 call for an international boycott, that Israel "was built mainly on land ethnically cleansed of its Palestinian owners," essentially calls Israel a criminal state that should be eliminated. This phrasing floats on a cesspool of Palestinians' daily cries to kill the Jews and destroy the Jewish state. Most Palestinian BDSers admit that their fantasy is to destroy Israel, but most BDS campus activists hide those exterminationist intentions in a cloud of human rights rhetoric – which returns us to Herzog's triumph over Toynbee.

BDS, Toynbee and the Red-Green, far left-Islamist alliance all stem from one historic poisonous plant. Despite Jews' legitimate national rights, only Israel is subjected to a systematic campaign questioning its right to exist. BDSers, like Toynbee, weave any Israeli imperfections into a broader, ultimately anti-Semitic, demonization of Jewish actions – and repudiation of Jewish rights. For millennia, bigots have exaggerated criticisms of Jewish individuals or Jewish communal acts to caricature Jews as a global threat and Judaism as threatening. Today, that same hatred targets Zionism and the Jewish state. Israel is now treated as "the Jew among nations," in the words of former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who watched Toynbee and Herzog debate as a 20-year-old McGill student.

Just as women, African-Americans, and gays endure insults today in the context of historic humiliations they suffered, today's obsession with Israel reeks of historic Jew hatred. Anti-Semitism's long pedigree, compounded by the Arab world's vicious medieval expressions of anti-Jewish bigotry today, explains the anguish these repeated BDS attempts have caused so many who revere McGill as a centre of higher education, dialogue, reason and reasonableness.

So, no, McGill's pro-Israel voices were not overreacting by resenting the resolution's insensitivity and bigotry. And yes, Jews take Israel personally, because it is the Jewish state built after millennia of Jewish suffering. Jews take Israel personally because most anti-Zionism echoes the historic demonization of Jews. And Jews take Israel personally because those attacking Israel usually attack Jews, too.

Kudos, then, to the McGill majority that created a broad left-right coalition, not for or against Israeli policy – that wasn't the issue – but for a fair debate on campus, a safe space for all McGill students, and a reasonable, productive approach to campus discussion in ways that don't demonize, polarize or marginalize. Let's debate Israel's actions – and others' actions – substantively, passionately, but let's drop the BDS BS – bullying, demonization and slander. ■

Facing the past is more important than ever in Poland

Sara Horowitz

My Polish colleagues and students are understandably sensitive when the terms "Polish death camps" and "Polish concentration camps" are used to refer to such places as Auschwitz, Treblinka, Chelmno and Sobibor. With good cause, they contend that such nefarious places were located in occupied Poland and under direct Nazi control. They note that when these sites of atrocity and death were operational, they were on German – and not autonomous Polish – soil.

I'm sympathetic to this desire to place blame squarely where it belongs. The Nazi genocide was, of course, a plan that emanated from Germany under Nazism, not hatched in Poland by Poles. My Polish colleagues note that their country and their countrymen were also victims of Nazism. They're right. Many, however, will add that the record of their countrymen toward Jews during the war was mixed. Many acknowledge that the victimization of Poland by the Nazis didn't preclude some Poles from also acting as victimizers of their Jewish neighbours.

That mixed record has been at the heart of the struggle of Polish national memory about World War II and the Holocaust: how to talk about the suffering of Poland under German occupation, and, at the same time, not use the memory of that suffering to cover up the collaboration of many Poles.

It's a natural, but not productive, impulse for both people and nations to shy away from shameful things in the past. In our millennium, Poland has been trying to look with honest eyes at the complexity of the historical record. Thanks to the work of pioneering historians of Poland such as Princeton professor Jan Gross, along with bold and committed researchers, educators and activists within Poland, there's been a movement to be accountable for Polish collaboration, alongside a commemoration of Polish rescuers, resistors and victims.

A look at two Polish films about Jewish victimization during the war – one from 1989 and one from 2013 – makes the change in attitude apparent. The 1989 made-for-TV film by renowned Polish director Krzysztof Kieslowski – No. 8 in his Decalogue series – features a Polish-born American woman who has come to Warsaw to confront a distinguished professor of ethics. The American interrupts a university class to ask the professor how she understands the ethical issues involving a Polish woman who had agreed to help shelter a little Jewish girl during the Holocaust, provided the girl underwent baptism, and then reneged on that commitment because the baptism entailed a false promise to God. We soon learn the ethics professor was that Polish woman and the American woman was the little girl she'd turned away. The plot centres on a challenge to Polish behaviour toward Jews during the war, but as we see the past unfold, the film vindicates the professor and the complexity of her motives.

By contrast, Pawel Pawlikowski's 2013 film Ida dramatizes the discovery of the shameful behaviour of a Polish farmer who murders a Jewish family he'd been paid to shelter, so that he could lay claim to their property. Unlike the earlier film, Ida doesn't soften its presentation of Poland's ambivalent treatment of Jews during war. It emerges from a different moment in Polish culture and a willingness to examine its past.

Many of us who research and teach about the Holocaust or eastern Europe fear signs that – in the name of restoring national pride – the present Polish government is working to reverse the accountability and honesty that reshaped Polish national memory in recent years. New legislation now under consideration would make it punishable by law to "blame the Polish nation for Nazi or Stalinist crimes." And there's a move afoot to strip Gross of the prestigious Knight's Cross of the Order of Merit awarded to him in the 1960s.

Perhaps the attention now being focused on Poland will reverse this ominous trend. Meaningful national pride emerges from facing history, not obscuring or falsifying difficult aspects. ■

Trump might be a nut, but he's not anti-Semitic

Michael Taube

To call this year's U.S. election cycle "crazy," "turbulent" and "circus-like" is an understatement. It's been, to put it mildly, downright nuts.

And the nut-in-chief, who could become the next commander-in-chief, has been Donald Trump.

The businessman is the front-runner for the Republican Party presidential nomination. He's built an impressive coalition of supporters, including new party members, and he's won primaries and caucuses in every corner of the country.

At this point, it's hard to see Trump losing the nomination. That's a huge concern for many small "c" conservatives, including me.

Trump has run a vicious campaign based on fear, intolerance, maliciousness and arrogance. His ideas and policies are, for the most part, the complete antithesis of what political conservatism represents, or should represent, in a democratic society.

Yet there's been an intriguing aspect to his Pyrrhic-like campaign. For all the personal and political attacks he's engaged in, one group has been left alone: Jews.

There are some reasons for this. Trump has worked with Jews in the real estate business for decades. Some of his friends and political supporters are Jewish, including Carl Icahn and Steve Wynn. His daughter, Ivanka, married New York Observer owner Jared Kushner and converted to Judaism in 2009.

There's also no evidence that Trump is, or has ever been, anti-Semitic.

But wait, some may argue. Trump Plaza Hotel and Casino's former president, John R. O'Donnell, wrote in his 1991 book Trumped! that his old boss reportedly said, "Black guys counting my money! I hate it. The only kind of people I want counting my money are little short guys that wear yarmulkes every day."

Is that true?

During a 1999 Playboy interview, Trump expressed his disdain for the author, but said "[t]he stuff O'Donnell wrote about me is probably true." He later told NBC's Meet the Press (in part) on Oct. 24, 1999, "He was fired. We fired him because he wasn't doing a very good job. He wrote this nasty book. He made up stuff… This guy, I hardly know him. He made up this quote. I've heard the quote before, and it's nonsense… I've never said anything like it, ever."

The Washington Examiner's Eddie Scarry also noted in a July 8, 2015, article that the news outlet Fusion reprinted the quote without acknowledging it's "second-hand from a former Trump employee, and not directly from Trump himself."

Since the air of doubt is pretty thick, we'll set this matter aside.

How about Trump's Dec. 3, 2015, speech to the Republican Jewish Coalition? He said he's a "negotiator… like you folks," and asked, "Is there anyone in this room who doesn't negotiate deals?" He also believes the Jewish community won't support him, because "I don't want your money. And you want to control your own politicians."

Let's try to get inside Trump's (warped) mind to understand his viewpoint.

Many Jews have been successful in business. This includes the art of negotiation, right? Meanwhile, the Jewish community may not want to "control" politicians, but, as financial donors, they obviously want to have some influence and input. All communities think along these lines.

So, while these are foolish, insensitive remarks, there's nothing anti-Semitic about them.

Fine. What about Israel?

Trump told Politico's Michael Crowley on Feb. 26, "I am totally pro-Israel." He also said, "I have very close ties to Israel. I've received the Tree of Life Award and many of the greatest awards given by Israel."

Yet he wants to be a "neutral" broker in the Middle East. Trump isn't interested in taking "sides," since it's "probably the toughest negotiation anywhere in the world."

It's not a wholly positive stance, but it sounds remarkably similar to the Trudeau government's decision to be an "honest" broker with Israel, don't you think?

Donald Trump may be a lot of things. Anti-Semitic isn't one of them. ■

An open tent requires an open mind

Bernie Farber

As we navigate our way through the perilous early 21st century, the question for our community is how big should we make our Jewish communal tent?

As we confront such problems as anti-Israel boycotts, Palestinian activism (as opposed to terrorism), anti-Israel invective (especially on university campuses), and the role of domestic social advocacy, we must address this issue.

From urging Jewish leadership to adopt a more active role in tikkun olam to addressing progressive views on Israel not aligned with mainstream beliefs, these are the issues we face.

Take, for example, CUNY professor Peter Beinart, a committed Jew and Zionist. Recognized as a brilliant scholar of modern Judaic thought, he was also a member of the debating society at Yale University, a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University and a former editor of the New Republic–the youngest person ever to hold that position. Beinart attends an Orthodox synagogue in New York, keeps kosher and sends his children to Jewish day school.

In 2010, he wrote a searing commentary that challenged the norms of the community. An opponent of BDS (though he does support limited boycotts of goods from the occupied territories), he has questioned mainstream Jewry's commitment to an open tent that would have room for such discussions, no matter how disturbing or how opposed we are to these ideas.

Beinart's goal is to take the blinders off North American Jewry's very staid leadership when it comes to Israel and criticism of Israeli policy. In a recent speech to the left-wing U.S. Zionist group J Street, Beinart said, "Any Jewish leader who conflates disagreement in policy with anti-Semitism should be fired."

Beinart has good reason to feel put upon. Official Hillel policy across North America is to disallow him from speaking to students at Hillel events. Even here in Canada, a couple years back, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' official recommendation to Canadian Hillel organizations was to refuse to engage with him.

Another case in point: last month, JNF Canada cancelled its co-sponsorship of a community Yom Ha'atzmaut concert in Vancouver featuring celebrated Israeli songstress Achinoam Nini, known as Noa. It seems that a mischievous and now retracted Feb. 12 Jerusalem Post article was to blame. It wrongly asserted that Noa is sympathetic to the BDS movement. Truth notwithstanding, JNF held firm. Thankfully, the Israeli Embassy stepped in to co-sponsor the event with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

Regarding social advocacy, in a recent edition of The CJN, dozens of well-respected Jewish academics, thinkers, authors, rabbis and teachers signed a letter decrying the demise of Jewish activism on social justice. I was among the signatories. Many, however, were afraid to sign, fearing the potential wrath of community leaders.

I understand this fear. Late last year, a senior Jewish communal professional took me to task simply for criticizing the way Jewish advocacy is conducted in our community. In a public rant on my Facebook page, a national spokesperson for the Jewish community claimed, "Your constant false and misleading attacks would be humorous, but for the fact that they damage the community… You mischaracterize X's work, and you do it deliberately, because you are angry and bitter… your complaints have little to do with social justice and everything to do with your own personal venom. Your motives are suspect, your tactics are loathsome."

I have a thick skin, but such public exhortations against me have the direct effect of silencing others who may now think twice before offering even constructive criticism to Jewish leadership.

In my view, short of hatemongers and those who will deny the right for Jews to a state of their own, all voices must be heard. Public bullying must be replaced with respectful listening. We may not like everything we hear, but in order to have an open tent that embraces the community, we also must have an open mind. ■

Shaar Shalom Synagogue to close after 44 years

plungen@thecjn.ca

After 44 years as a house of worship, Shaar Shalom Synagogue will close its doors on June 30.

A perfect storm of circumstances conspired to bring to an end the life of the Markham synagogue, which was started in a house basement by several families living in the Don Mills Road and Steeles Avenue area.

Two hundred and sixteen members gathered in the shul March 9 to hear the Conservative synagogue's officials describe the events that led to the announcement.

"It was a shock to a number of members," said synagogue president Seymour Hersh. "A number of members were very sad. There were tears. There was some anger."

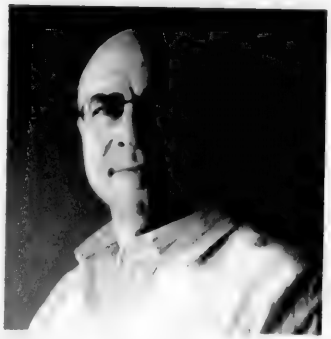
While many were shocked, there were plenty of indicators going back several years to suggest the synagogue was facing an existential crisis.

Four years ago, Hersh and other synagogue officials already saw disturbing trends emerge. Some 15 to 20 family units – membership varies from individuals to large families – were leaving each year. That, of course, impacted current and future revenues.

With membership and financial trendlines heading south, the shul embarked on a renewal project aimed at stopping the bleeding and salvaging a cherished institution, Hersh said.

The synagogue adopted a position on "relational Judaism" that focused on becoming more welcoming, open and inclusive.

At the same time, 325 members agreed to pay an assessment of $750 each to give the synagogue some financial breathing room and stability.



Seymour Hersh

The shul is located near Don Mills and Steeles.

> A number of members were very sad. There were tears. There was some anger.

But over the years, the negative trends continued, and demographic realities suggested the future looked bleak.

Many children of original members left the synagogue's neighbourhood, moving west toward Bathurst or south towards downtown. Often their parents moved with them to be close to their children, Hersh said.

Some of the older members downsized as well, leaving their homes and moving to condos in other parts of town. And as some older members retired on fixed incomes, their dues were subsidized by other members, adding to the financial strain.

"Our average age has been rising rapidly. It's now 64 years old. It should be much younger," Hersh said.

Over the years, membership dropped from a peak of 555 member units to 380 paying members, he said.

In January, Rabbi Steven Schwarzman, an American who was hired in 2014, informed the board he would be leaving, probably to a congregation south of the border.

"The red flag went up high," Hersh said.

Then in mid-February, the synagogue received more bad news. Cantor Ben Silverberg notified the shul he would be leaving to take a similar position at Beth Torah Congregation.

"That was a seismic event for the synagogue," Hersh said. "If you don't have clergy, especially clergy that have taken you through birth, death and bar mitzvahs, that's an important piece.

"That creates an emptiness for our members."

With an absence of clergy, $545,000 still owing on a mortgage, declining membership and bleak prospects, the executive and board decided to close the institution, Hersh said.

The synagogue has reached out to developers to determine what price the building might fetch, and Hersh said any proceeds available after satisfying liabilities will go to ensure the continued viability of the synagogue's cemetery plots, which number more than 300.

As for the future, Hersh said the synagogue has reached out to other Conservative congregations to determine what options are available for Shaar Shalom members.

"We're gathering information and having discussions," he said.

He expects to have a better sense of the future in four to six weeks, and he will present options to the members at that time.

But given all the circumstances, it's clear that Shaar Shalom as it has existed will come to an end.

"Shaar Shalom faced a perfect storm," he acknowledged. "The only thing we didn't have was an ark." ■

Misogyny 'alive and well,' says rabbinic pioneer

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

As a little girl, when Rabbi Lila Kagedan was asked what she wanted to be when she grew up, she said "rabbi."

"I looked up to rabbis. I loved going to shul on chagim and Shabbat, and during the week when I could."

While her grandmother would say "that's not a job for a nice Jewish girl," her late father encouraged her to dream, saying, "Maybe you'll be the first Orthodox rabbi as a woman."

Now she is indeed the first Orthodox woman in North America to call herself "rabbi," a change that she describes as "incredible progress."

In 2015, after earning her smichah from New-York-based Yeshivat Maharat, founded in 2009 as the first yeshiva to ordain Orthodox women in North America, Rabbi Kagedan was hired as a spiritual leader at Mount Freedom Jewish Centre, an open Orthodox shul in New Jersey.

Although the only one to take the title "rabbi," there have been 11 graduates of the yeshiva, who call themselves either "rabba" or "maharat." There are 22 other women currently enrolled.

"My title is an accurate descriptor of what it is that I do – much like calling a doctor a doctor. Rabbi, after all, means teacher," Rabbi Kagedan said in a lecture March 7 at the National Council of Jewish Women, organized by the Toronto Partnership Minyan.

Speaking about her path to becoming a rabbi, she shared the challenges she faced as an Orthodox woman.

"I was drawn to ritual. I felt committed to the halachic process, but to be honest, I became absolutely disgruntled several times growing up," said Rabbi Kagedan, who grew up in Montreal and Ottawa.

One of those times was when her 13-year-old brother was permitted to sit on a beit din for the annulment of vows before Yom Kippur. "Meanwhile, I felt like I had no status."

Rabbi Kagedan, a clinical ethicist with degrees from institutions such as University of Toronto and Harvard University, said that "it always amazed me how much was expected of me in terms of my secular education… while virtually nothing was expected of me in terms of ritual or religious leadership… It was just sufficient that I show up, and even that was not mandatory."

She said she knew that if she were male, she would have the freedom to pursue the rabbinate, "but it wasn't possible for me."

Rabbi Lila Kagedan

She said that when she met Rabba Sara Hurwitz, the Yeshivat Maharat dean, she was studying privately for the Jerusalem rabbinate ordination tests and she was in graduate school at the time, "but there was something graduate school was not offering me. There was a void. And the idea of studying with a community, rather than alone, and the idea of having institutional backing and the idea that I could be a part of the change that I had always envisioned for world Jewry was too compelling to decline."

Speaking about the resolution passed in 2015 by the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) that reaffirmed its 2010 position that women should not be ordained, nor should women be hired for rabbinic positions in Orthodox institutions, Rabbi Kagedan said it elicited anxiety and concern among women in the field.

But despite the ruling, Rabbi Kagedan did not criticize the RCA for its stance.

"I am a product of RCA teaching, so I don't have anything negative to say about the RCA, mostly because I don't have anything bad to say about my teachers."

But, Rabbi Kagedan added, "there are no shortages of obstacles" for Orthodox Jewish women. "Even if this feels normal to some, there is no question that it is a struggle and a fight. Misogyny is alive and well, especially in the Jewish community, and we must not give up this fight."

She said she's taken her father's advice to combat those who oppose women in leadership roles with the very texts they use to try to provide halachic reasons for keeping women out of leadership roles.

"I guarantee you, the community will be better off with women in these roles… People who have experienced marginalization… people who have struggled so much to achieve what is obvious to others… are uniquely positioned to meet the needs of the community in different ways and to be sensitive to the need of the community in a variety of ways." ■

We feel safe on campus, York and Waterloo students say

Despite the hype about anti-Semitism on Canadian university campuses, a handful of Jewish students involved with Hillel at York University and with Hillel in Waterloo stressed during meetings with prospective students that they feel totally safe being openly Jewish on campus.

Organized by Hillel Ontario, the March 7 and 9 meetings enabled high schoolers interested in attending York, Wilfred Laurier University or the University of Waterloo, as well as their parents, to hear first hand about Hillel's activities at those schools and what Jewish life there looks like.

On March 7, at a private residence in Thornhill, about 20 people – prospective York students and their parents – listened to members of the Hillel executive and students who participate in Hillel events discuss their experiences and answer questions.

Natalie Slavat, president of Hillel at York; first-year student Michael Paskaru; and third-year student Ricki Birnbaum, reassured the audience they feel very safe at York, despite the recent controversy surrounding a mural hanging in the school's student centre that depicts a person wearing a Palestinian flag about to throw a rock at what looks like an Israeli bulldozer.

"I felt really lonely at York at first. But I've met so many friends through Hillel. Hillel promotes unity among so many Jews, from atheists to those who are Orthodox," Birnbaum said.

In addition to hosting social events and providing a lounge where students can relax, Hillel has helped the students with things such as getting religious accommodation to move exams scheduled for Shabbat or holidays, panelists said.

"I went to a public high school. Through Hillel at York, I feel I've gained a sense of community and belonging," Paskaru said.

Slavat said Hillel has helped her carve out her own Jewish identity and "express my Judaism my own way."

In response to a question from an audience member about anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on campus, Slavat said the mural controversy and politics surrounding the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement – in 2013, the York Federation of Students passed a resolution to endorse BDS – sometimes make things "tough." But she stressed that Hillel has a strong working relationship with York's administration and campus security, which makes the Jewish community on campus feel looked after.

Adir Krafman, Hillel Ontario's associate director of advocacy and strategic communications, said Hillel helps Jewish students counter anti-Israel activity by encouraging them to learn more about the political situation in the Middle East and reinforcing positive messages about Israel on campus.

"We have interns on campus whose job it is to engage students about Israel. We work to explain to people that, for example, Israel has checkpoints because of security concerns, but also to get people to associate Israel with things other than war," he said.

At the Hillel Waterloo meeting March 9, held at a home in Forest Hill, a different panel of students shared their experiences.

They praised Hillel for providing social opportunities and enriching their sense of Jewish community life, and addressed the group's recent victory in campaigning to defeat a recent motion calling for the severing of ties between the University of Waterloo and Israeli academic institutions.

"The school administration really supported us," said student panelist Leeat Perlman.

She added: "These things aren't enjoyable, but it brought people out of the woodwork. People we didn't know were part of the Jewish community... and even non-Jews were all walking around until the last minute [before the motion went to a vote] talking to people about the issue." ■

Scholars celebrate diversity at Rabbi 2 Rabbi event

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Diversity of thought and opinion should be welcomed, Rabbi Mark Fishman, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal told Rabbi Yael Splansky of Holy Blossom Temple and some 100 people who had gathered at the Reform temple for an evening of dialogue between these two senior rabbis.

"Differences can be celebrated," said Rabbi Fishman, who is Orthodox. "We should not be divided over the things we cannot agree on. Each of us has to know who we are and become that in the fullest sense of possibility, so differences are OK. How we care for the other and how we treat the other who's different than us is the key."

The two rabbis had been corresponding by email for two years on a variety of religious and other topics and appearing monthly in the CJN column Rabbi 2 Rabbi. The weekly series features a dialogue between two rabbis of different denominations and different cities (Montreal and Toronto) with four rotating pairs of clergy.

On March 10, the column came alive as rabbis Splansky and Fishman held a dialogue in real time on a variety of texts. The two rabbis had never met until last week.

Each one had chosen texts that would keep them interested if they were ever stranded on a desert island. The evening was moderated by CJN editor Yoni Goldstein, who dreamed up the Rabbi 2 Rabbi series.

He said he thought these dialogues would help readers get a sense of rabbinical thinking and how rabbis interact. "What's special about this grouping over the two years is the camaraderie that has developed."

Rabbi Fishman likened his participation in Rabbi 2 Rabbi to a study partnership. "I have learned a tremendous amount from Rabbi Splansky from a Jewish study perspective."

Rabbi Splansky, in turn, thanked Goldstein for "pushing boundaries and building bridges." This kind of dialogue is rare, she said. "It's hard in Toronto for rabbis of different denominations to speak honestly. Things are changing thanks to this CJN platform."

She said she, too, enjoyed studying with a peer. "You don't study Torah alone. It's meant to be studied in partnership."

One of the desert island texts Rabbi Fishman's chose was in Genesis, Chapter 3, verses 11 to 12, when God asked Adam if he had eaten from the tree of knowledge, and Adam blamed his transgression on Eve.

He called Adam and Eve "a paradigm for humanity." Adam had "blown it" and could no longer live in paradise, because he didn't take responsibility for his actions. "To err is to be human... We make mistakes all the time. It's OK if we can learn from them."

Rabbi Splansky offered another interpretation: "What if Adam was afraid of the God who made the world? Maybe God could have done more for Adam to be less afraid."

"That's a stunning question," Rabbi Fishman replied. "I'll need months [to study it]."

He disagreed with Rabbi Splansky's interpretation of Genesis 39:1. She said Abraham is drawn to a burning palace that's "radiating God's glory" because he's a "spiritual seeker."

"The flames are too religious for my liking – too frummy," he said. "I like the picture of Abraham seen in the glow of the palace... I just don't think that's the Abraham of Lech Lecha."

Rabbi Splansky gave another interpretation: when Abraham saw the palace on fire, he recognized danger and took charge of the rescue and repairing the damage. He is a "champion of justice," rather than a "spiritual seeker." This view is closer to Rabbi Fishman's, who sees God urging Abraham to repair the world. "The fire is the breakdown of society," and God tells him to create a society that can function. ■

Doctors wrestle with ethics of 'assisted suicide'

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dr. Albert Kirshen said it's just a matter of time before one of his patients asks him for assistance to die. Kirshen, an observant Jew who is a physician at the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital, said he is bracing himself for the inevitable.

Kirshen is "personally conflicted" and struggling with the new Supreme Court-mandated policy that will permit physician-assisted death (PAD), he said, explaining that while the medical college will require him to accommodate patients' requests to die, Jewish law does not permit him to make a referral to end a life.

Kirshen spoke to the issue at a town hall meeting on "the implications of the proposed federal assisted suicide legislation on the practice of medicine," held March 7 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto. About 300 people, many of them physicians, packed the shul's social hall to learn more about the issue from an Orthodox perspective that reflected the views of rabbis, physicians and a legal expert.

Presenters included Kirshen; Dr. Nathan Herrmann, head of geriatric psychiatry at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre; Charles Wagner, a lawyer who specializes in estate and trusts; and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, rosh beit midrash, Yeshiva University Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim introduced the issues, Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT) gave closing remarks, and Dr. Janice Halpern, a psychiatrist affiliated with Mount Sinai and the University of Toronto, moderated.

Rabbi Strauchler explained that the town hall – jointly held by Shaarei Shomayim and the BAYT – was organized because many observant physicians have been approaching their rabbis to ask about their options as doctors and Jews as they confront the upcoming new legal reality, and they want to know how the Jewish community can address it.

"We are wrestling with difficult emotional and ethical challenges," Rabbi Strauchler said. "Physicians are asked to control the dying process. They are gatekeepers of a new right to die."

Although conscientious objection may be legal, he said there might be cultural pressure on physicians to comply with what could become the norm.

Wagner said the law must balance freedom of conscience, which is protected by the Charter of Rights, and a person's legal right to die. He explained that the Supreme Court's landmark decision in 2015 (Carter vs. Canada) gives competent adults with intolerable medical suffering the right to seek physician assistance to die, as long as the patient's consent is clear.

He pointed to the discrepancies between the Carter ruling and the more recent parliamentary report, which he likened to the European model of PAD.

While the American model is limited to severe, terminal illness, the parliamentary report has expanded the parameters of PAD to allow competent minors to terminate their lives after three years, as well as people with severe depression.

Herrmann said people with depression should not be candidates for PAD, because in most cases, depression can be treated with drugs and most people improve over time. As well, advanced Alzheimer's disease or other types of severe dementia should also not be criteria, even if people have given such directives, he said. While their quality of life may be limited to music and food, they're not unhappy. "The vast number of patients do not suffer. Their families suffer."

Kirshen told the physicians in attendance to start devising a strategy for dealing with the new reality. "You're going to be asked, so be prepared by sorting out for yourself what your answer will be."

He stressed the importance of investigating the reasons why a person would want to end his or her life without being judgemental. "Look for what makes the person vulnerable." He also advised physicians to keep written records of such encounters and to consult with colleagues and rabbis.

Rabbi Torczyner discussed several rabbinic opinions on PAD. He said according to one, physicians should not jeopardize their ability to make a living by refusing to make a referral for it, as they're stipulated to do by their medical colleges.

"It doesn't mean it's morally permissible. It doesn't mean we should welcome it," he said. "You don't want all the observant physicians to resign. There's a great communal need for observant doctors to serve."

Rabbi Korobkin urged people to oppose the legislation publicly. "We are not yet at the point where the rules are set in stone... A society that sanctions death is not a society." ■

GSU divestment petition backed by U of T faculty

sshefa@thecjn.ca

More than 130 University of Toronto faculty members and librarians signed a statement in support of a Graduate Students' Union's (GSU) petition that calls on the university to divest from three companies that do business with Israel.

"These three companies have been singled out because they manufacture and sell weaponry and other technologies that are being used to destroy Palestinian lives and welfare on a daily basis," said the statement, titled, "Declaration of Faculty and Librarians in Support of the GSU Campaign for Divestment from the Israeli Occupation."

U of T Divest, a GSU committee formed to promote the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel, drafted a petition that calls on the University of Toronto Asset Management (UTAM) to divest from three companies – Northrop Grumman, Hewlett Packard, and Lockheed Martin – because they're "directly profiting from the ongoing military occupation of Palestinian territories."

"Given the long-term failure of diplomacy alone to address the rapidly deteriorating situation of Palestinians, it is imperative to take further action. We must identify the injustices, speak out against them, and support the Palestinian appeal for solidarity," the statement said, urging the university to form a governing council committee to "refrain from investing in all companies involved in such violations of international law."

The petition comes on the heels of a similar initiative at York University called YUDivest, which was endorsed earlier this month by the York University Faculty Association.

B'nai Brith Canada CEO Michael Mostyn said that for an institution ranked as highly as U of T, the position taken by members of its faculty is alarming.

"The Canadian government has condemned the BDS movement, a movement steeped in anti-Semitism," Mostyn said. "That so many members of the faculty are willing to endorse divestment from Israel demonstrates how ignorant they are to the facts… I worry about what our children are being taught."

Hillel Ontario CEO Marc Newburgh said the fact U of T faculty and librarians single out Israel for condemnation and hold it to a higher standard of fairness than other democracies is "deplorable."

He said an article in U of T's campus newspaper the Varsity originally reported faculty supported the BDS movement, but Hillel intervened, and the article was edited to remove the BDS reference. "After Hillel asked for the original press release, that article was edited to report that a group of 125 random faculty have put together a petition calling for a divestment from only three companies, and removing the reference to a blanket support of BDS."

Despite that distinction, Omar Sirri, a member of the GSU's BDS committee, told the Varsity that faculty support is "wonderful news for the BDS movement on campus. This level of faculty support is further indication [that] support for the BDS movement is steadily growing."

Newburgh said Hillel, its partners and U of T students have worked to "defeat BDS three times this year" and "will continue to support students in fighting BDS province-wide."

Requests for comment from UTAM and U of T Divest went unanswered. ■

Temple partners with mosque to sponsor Syrians

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

At the launch of a joint Jewish-Muslim initiative to sponsor two Syrian refugee families to resettle in the Toronto area, federal Minister of Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship John McCallum thanked the participants for their commitment to helping those in need.

"The collection of Muslims and Jewish people, coming together in a single room to work together for the national good, and for the good of the refugees – from the bottom of my heart, I really thank you all," said McCallum, who spoke at Temple Har Zion synagogue in Thornhill at the March 6 launch of its refugee project in partnership with the mosque next door, the Imam Mahdi Islamic Centre (IMIC).

Andrew Hazen, a co-chair of the THZ-IMIC Refugee Project, noted there are four million people trying to escape the civil war in Syria, and even those living in camps are still under threat.

He said the objective is to raise about $60,000 to sponsor two families through Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) Toronto.

"[JIAS] has been doing this kind of work, helping refugees and immigrants resettle in this area for 100 years," Hazen said, adding that the funds will go toward providing financial support for the families' first year in Canada at the same level as government-assisted refugees.

Lia Kisel, JIAS' language and settlement director, said JIAS requires 60 per cent of funds to be raised before the application to sponsor a family can be submitted.

But raising the funds is the easy part.

"The settlement plan is going to be created in partnership with Temple Har Zion. We not only need your assistance to secure the funds, but we need your assistance also to volunteer your time after the refugees arrive, which is when the real hard work begins, to settle and integrate the families," Kisel said.

McCallum said the 25,000 refugees who have come to Canada are a "very vulnerable group."

"They came from a list provided by the United Nations, and typically, they do not speak a word of English or French, they don't have as much education, they have large numbers of children and they are probably on an airplane for the first time in their lives when they came to Canada," he said.

Hazen said that in the months since the government announced its commitment to welcome 25,000 Syrian refugees, the question of security and screening has been a concern for many Canadians.

"We've looked at it carefully, and the folks who come through the refugee program are screened and vetted and interviewed and fingerprinted and photographed and run through databases by the UN. And then Canadian immigration officials do it all over again, making sure their stories match, their places match, names match, faces match and so on… Honestly, if someone with nefarious intentions wanted to get into the country, there are so many easier ways to do it than through the refugee program," Hazen said.

Rabbi Cory Weiss spoke about the commandment in the Torah to love the stranger, "one whose colour, culture, creed is different from yours."

He said in the Torah, there are 36 references to the commandment to love the stranger.

"'You shall not oppress a stranger, for you understand the soul of the stranger, having yourself been strangers in the land of Egypt,'" Rabbi Weiss said, quoting the Torah.

"Jews certainly understand this feeling. The phrase, 'None is too many,' was coined for us, for our ancestors trying to flee Nazi Germany in the 1930s. Only 4,000 Jewish refugees were permitted in Canada before and during World War II. We know, all too well, the fate that befell the rest who tried to come, but were stopped at the door," he said.

McCallum spoke about his emotional experience meeting refugee children in Jordan, seeing the conditions they were living in, and then welcoming them when they arrived in Canada.

"I think in a time when so many countries are closing their doors on refugees, it is good that we are saying, as long as we are doing it right, they are welcome. I think it sends a message to the world that the world needs sending," McCallum said. ■

High schoolers learn about Shoah at annual symposium

MYRON LOVE

Pinchas Gutter YOUTUBE SCREENSHOT

Toronto Holocaust survivor Pinchas Gutter is scheduled to be the keynote speaker at Winnipeg's annual high school Holocaust symposium, which is being held two months earlier than usual this year in an effort to attract more students.

Gutter, a child survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto and several concentration camps, is slated to speak March 17 at the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's 15th Holocaust and Human Rights Symposium for students in grades 9 to 12.

In years past, the event was always held in May. "We decided move the date up to accommodate schools' busy schedules," said Belle Jarniewski, chair of the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre. "Each year we send out a post-symposium poll, and schools have told us that May is a busy month for them. We weighed this against possible issues with weather and decided to try an earlier date this year.

"As well, we have not been able to invite the University of Winnipeg Collegiate students in the past, as they have already finished their academic year in May. We are pleased to welcome a large number of its students this year."

Average attendance has been about 1,200 students from high schools in Winnipeg and surrounding areas. "We hope to have many more students attend this year," Jarniewski said. "Registration is still ongoing."

Gutter – whom Jarniewski called "an extraordinary individual" – was born into a family that can trace its roots back 400 years in Poland. Originally from Lodz, he was seven years old when the war broke out. He and his family lived in the Warsaw Ghetto for 3-1/2 years until April 1943, the time of the ghetto uprising. They were deported to the Majdanek death camp, where the rest of Gutter's family was murdered. He survived six concentration camps and a death march toward the end of the war. Russian forces liberated him in May 1945, and, under the auspices of the United Nations, he was taken to Britain with other children for rehabilitation. After spending many years in South Africa, he immigrated to Canada.

Gutter divides his time between speaking about the Holocaust and volunteering as a cantor at a Toronto synagogue, and as a lay chaplain at Baycrest and a local prison. He has spoken to many young people in Canada and around the world about his struggle for survival.

The Freeman Holocaust Centre is located on the Asper Jewish Community Campus. Its exhibits consist of artifacts donated by local survivors and their families.

"Our mandate is to raise awareness and understanding of the history of the Shoah through education," Jarniewski said. "We address the fact that society continues to witness genocide due to continuing racism and hatred and that we must all be vigilant in opposing racism, anti-Semitism and other forms of bigotry.

"The purpose of our symposium is to allow students to have the exceptional opportunity to learn first hand about the Shoah and what we need to learn from it. Each speaker brings with him or her their own moving and special story that defines for the students why the Shoah is the ultimate prototype for the study of human rights violations, what they can learn from it and what they can do in their everyday lives to make a difference."

Previous speakers have included Holocaust survivors Eva Kuper, Robbie Waisman, Ely Gotz, Max Eisen and the late Leon Leyson, the youngest of the Schindler's List survivors. Also addressing the symposium in the past have been Father Patrick Desbois, author of Holocaust by Bullets, chronicling the French Catholic priest's efforts to learn the fates of numerous eastern European Jews who perished in the Holocaust; and Leon Bass, an African-American soldier who witnessed the liberation of Buchenwald.

Students also hear from more recent survivors of mass murder. This year, Kobra Rahimi, a Kurdish refugee, will speak about her experiences. Rahimi was born in a refugee camp in southern Iraq after her parents fled their town in Iran when the Iran-Iraq War began in 1979. The family spent 22 years in the camp, and Kobra lived there until age 15. She came to Canada in 2001, making Winnipeg her home. Despite having attended school for only grades 1 and 2, Kobra went directly into Grade 9, but still managed to graduate high school and earn a BA in criminal justice from the University of Winnipeg. She's now in her second year of law at the University of Manitoba.

"After coming to Canada, Kobra struggled with her identity, both as a Muslim and a Kurd, in particular when members of her family were injured in the war in Iraq in 2007," Jarniewski said. "Because of these experiences, Kobra is now active in different community initiatives to bring people together of different faiths and ethnicities."

Council suspends publisher over violent jihad remarks

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, WINDSOR, ONT

A local publisher of an Arabic language newspaper has been suspended on unpaid leave from the Windsor multicultural council for allegedly calling for violent jihad against Israel.

The issue was brought to light by B'nai Brith Canada, which received a tip on its anti-hate hotline about Mohamad Hisham Khalifeh, founder and publisher of the Al Forqan newspaper. Windsor police have also launched an investigation

Khalifeh was working as a life skills coach with newly arrived immigrants, including Syrian refugees. Kathleen Thomas, executive director of the Multicultural Council of Windsor and Essex County, said Khalifeh was suspended once the charges appeared in local media. "We immediately took action and placed the individual under unpaid investigative suspension, until we conduct an investigation into the matter," she said.

Khalifeh was near the end of a three-month contract as a life skills worker. Asked if he was associated with the council prior to that, Thomas said "not as an employee."

B'nai Brith Canada called for improved vetting of people working with newly arrived immigrants. CEO Michael Mostyn said the suspension is an "important first step," but questioned the extent of vetting of people who work with immigrants.

"It does call certain matters into question," he said. "And certainly the fact that this did miss their radar screen for whatever reason, whether through a lack of vetting or perhaps they just missed this one." He urged the council to resubmit its staff and volunteers for improved screening.

But Thomas said Khalifeh was already vetted at the highest level of police checks, "and we do that on a normal basis."

This vetting is known as the "police vulnerable sector check" and includes information related to convictions, outstanding warrants, charges, judicial orders and sexual offences "for which the individual has received a record suspension where authorized by the minister of public safety and emergency preparedness."

Asked if the council will step up its vetting, Thomas replied, "We've been doing work since 1973 and working in the resettlement process since 2001, and we've worked with many newcomers, so therefore we've always done our due diligence with regard to hiring and screening practices."

Mohamad Hisham Khalifeh FACEBOOK

Khalifeh's editorial appears to defend the ongoing knife attacks against Israeli citizens as a form of jihad. It appears in Al Forqan's October-November 2015 edition.

A translation is titled "The Duty of Jihad" and among other things, states that "the Palestinian teenager is [standing] alone wielding a knife in his hand, defending the honour and dignity of every Arab and every Muslim, and moreover every person. He [the Palestinian teenager] does not accept the injustice in the face of the Zionist usurper." Also, "I'm asking Allah to give victory to the youths of Palestine and every freeman who does not accept injustice and shame."

Khalifeh's violent rhetoric allegedly appeared in more places, including an online video that shows rocket attacks on Israel accompanied by the poem: "Fire [at Israel], Fire because you are courageous, Fire because you are the typhoon, Show them your bravery, raise your head, show them the descendants of the [Caliph Omar] al-Mukhtar [conqueror of Jerusalem], Break your shackle, show your sword, destroy the siege imposed on you, Destroy the brutal Zion [Israel]."

Khalifeh allegedly also published incendiary remarks on his Facebook page, since removed, according to sources.

The Windsor Jewish Federation sent a letter to the Jewish community about Khalifeh. Acting president David Robins said the federation is "very concerned about this activity, because we believe it is anti-Semitic and may be a hate crime," adding that "we believe the celebration of violence and jihad poses a threat to the security of Windsor residents and undermines the values that make our community safe and diverse."

When contacted by The CJN, Khalifeh declined comment and referred to his statements in the Windsor Star, and said he was contacting a lawyer.

Khalifeh told the Star he was only defending Palestinians right to resist Israeli occupation, especially regarding resettlement, which the United Nations has condemned as illegal. But he didn't take issue with his suspension at the multicultural council.

"They have the right to investigate," he said. "But I believe I have been accused of something I did not do," adding that B'nai Brith misinterpreted him. "My opinion was quoted in a wrong way." However, he said he supports "all kinds of resistance."

Mostyn said it was "disturbing" the comments didn't come to anyone's attention until after his organization raised it, long after the newspaper was published. "It wasn't reported to authorities or anyone else in the community from the readership of that paper," he said. "So these very, very foul views were basically hiding in plain sight."

B'nai Brith is urging police and federal and provincial officials to do a full investigation. ■

Israelis grapple with results of new Pew study

BEN SALES
JTA, TEL AVIV

In a survey that spanned politics, religion and interfaith relations, one statistic stood out: nearly half of Israel's Jews support expelling the country's Arabs.

The Pew Research Center's study of Israelis' attitudes, which had its findings released March 8, had asked respondents whether they agreed that "Arabs should be expelled or transferred from Israel." Forty-eight per cent of Israeli Jews agreed, while 46 per cent did not. Among self-described right-wing Jews, 72 per cent agreed, along with 71 per cent of religious Zionists.

The figure was inconsistent with the findings of previous studies and provoked strong reactions in a country that sees its Arab minority as proof of its commitment to democratic values and respect for diversity. It has also shined a spotlight on what has been seen previously as a fringe proposal. No party in the Israeli Knesset advocates mass population transfer, and it has never been seriously discussed as a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The idea that the State of Israel could be a democracy only for its Jewish citizens is unconscionable and we must find a way to address this," Israeli President Reuven Rivlin said at a meeting with officials of the Washington-based Pew centre. "I believe that also our democratic values are born out of our Jewish faith, a love for the stranger and equality before the law."

Rivlin called on the public to engage in "soul-searching and moral reflection."

But Alan Cooperman, the Pew study's lead author, says support for expulsion comports with other data points in the survey. Cooperman pointed to survey findings that nearly four out of five Israeli Jews say Israel should give preferential treatment to Jews, 60 per cent of Israeli Jews believe God gave the land to them, and that majorities of religious Zionists and haredi Orthodox also feel Jewish law should be the law of the state.

"You see it really makes sense," he said. "Support is strongest among [religious Zionists], very high among settlers."

Analysts say Jewish animosity toward Israeli Arabs has been exacerbated by the recent wave of Palestinian terror attacks and a government response that some consider inflammatory. Rawnak Natour, the co-director of Sikkuy, a non-profit that works toward Arab-Jewish coexistence, pointed to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech decrying "two nations within Israel" following a January terror attack in Tel Aviv.

"I think there's a feeling of fear here that's strengthened by the political echelon," Natour said. "There's a lack of familiarity of the other side."

The Pew finding on expulsion is significantly higher than other recent polls that have sought to measure Israeli attitudes toward coexistence. The 2015 Israel Democracy Index, a survey published annually by the Israel Democracy Institute, found 37.5 per cent support for the government merely encouraging Arab emigration.

A 2015 poll by Haifa University Prof. Sammy Smooha found that six in 10 Israeli Jews felt "it would be good for Arabs and Jews to always live together in Israel." That survey also found 32 per cent of respondents in favour of encouraging Arabs to leave Israel in exchange for compensation.

Israeli pollsters have laid blame on the question itself, calling it vague and misleading. Is the question about Israeli Arabs, West Bank Palestinians or both? When would this expulsion occur, and under what conditions? Would the Arab refugees be compensated?

"It was asked in a very unclear way," said Tamar Hermann, academic director of IDI's Guttman Center for Surveys. "If we didn't get a majority on a more cautious and less aggressive version [of the question], what happened here? I would say take it with a grain of salt."

The statistic is a sign not only of extremism but also of polarization in Israeli society, says Steven M. Cohen, a sociology professor at New York's Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion who consulted on the Pew study. Regardless of the exact level of support, he called the figure a "warning sign" for Israeli and Jewish leaders.

"There's a lot of support for this notion that God gave this land to me – not to them, to me," Cohen said at a panel discussion of the survey last week in Tel Aviv. "Is there a context in which it seems the authorities are trying to diminish the place of minorities in this country? Is that happening? If that's happening, then this question becomes very critical." ■

Arabs buy pastries in the Old City of Jerusalem on March 4. A recent Pew poll showed that nearly half of Israel's Jews support expelling Arabs from the country.

Former MK Dov Lipman participates in a goodbye ceremony March 11 for Taylor Force, the American citizen killed in a stabbing terror attack in Jaffa last week, before his body was sent back to be buried in the United States. Members of the U.S. military in the area also attended the service.

How stabbing victim turned the tables on attacker

BEN SALES
JTA, PETAH TIKVA

Only after Yonatan Azriaev grabbed the terrorist's arms and threw him against a wall of soft drinks did he think he was about to die.

Azriaev, a member of the Breslov chassidic sect, had been handing out religious pamphlets in the open-air market when he stepped inside a shop at around 4 p.m. on March 8, hoping to give one to the cashier. Then he felt sharp blows to his back and shoulders.

Feeling like he was punched, Azriaev said he figured he was being attacked by someone who hated religious people. But then the shop owner started yelling, "It's a terrorist! It's a terrorist!"

Realizing he had been stabbed, Azriaev said he followed his instincts. He swiveled around, grabbed the attacker by the arms, swung him in a circle – "like you would with a kid," he explained – and threw him against the wall. The attacker fell to the floor and Azriaev realized he was bleeding from the neck.

"I thought that was it, I wouldn't live," Azriaev told JTA in a bedside interview last Thursday from Rabin Medical Center where he is recovering from his injuries. "I saw he was fighting with someone else. When I saw that, I said, 'I won't live.' So, I said, he shouldn't kill more people."

> I thank God for the miracle He did for me...What can save us is just a short prayer to God.
> Stabbing victim Yonatan Azriaev

After slamming the attacker against the wall, Azriaev's memory went blank and he doesn't remember what happened next. Some of the details remain unclear, but the story that has emerged sounds like something from an action movie.

Azriaev, still bleeding from his wound, pulled the knife from his own neck and stabbed his attacker, reportedly a Palestinian, who died a few minutes later. According to one report, Azriaev initially fled the store before returning to confront the attacker, but Israeli police were unable to confirm that, telling JTA only that some part of the incident occurred inside the shop and some part outside.

The next thing Azriaev remembers is leaving the store and paramedics rushing to help him. Upon returning home from hospital, Azriaev said he plans to resume his mission in life: distributing the pamphlets.

"I thought, if there was one thing that could save me, it would just be that I would keep handing out these pamphlets," he said. "That's why God would save me."

A burly man with a calm face engulfed by a bushy black-and-white beard, Azriaev, 35, has spent the past 16 years studying religious books. He lives with his wife and five children in Yavniel, a 4,000-person agricultural village near the Sea of Galilee in northern Israel. He served in a non-combat position in the Israeli army. He doesn't exercise.

Azriaev joined the Breslov sect at 19 after reading one of its pamphlets. Today, he spends his mornings studying Torah and afternoons traveling around Israel distributing the glossy, palm-sized booklets with chassidic texts to passersby. On that Tuesday, he was distributing one titled You will succeed.

Azriaev's story was one of the few silver linings in a day marred by tragedy. Two stabbing attacks and one shooting in three Israeli cities left 11 injured and one American tourist, Taylor Force, dead.

Every day, when he leaves home and when he returns, Azriaev thanks God for keeping him healthy and whole. He doesn't take credit for saving lives on Tuesday – not even his own. He still doesn't know exactly how he did it but says God, not him, deserves praise.

"I thank God for the miracle He did for me," Azriaev said. "As much as someone takes care of himself, it's not enough. What can save us is just a short prayer to God." ■

BDS and the Purim story: disturbing parallels

Gerald Steinberg

The Purim Megillah, with its many tragi-comic twists and turns, keeps us entertained every year, while today's headlines remind us that the plotline is far from unique. Mordechai, Esther and Achashverosh, the buffoon king, are (somewhat) exaggerated, but it seems that every generation has its Haman characters – including anti-Semites filled with hate, dedicated to attacking the Jewish People.

Today's version is known as BDS – the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement – whose leaders have the same goals as Haman. BDS is no laughing matter, but it has plenty of jokers – for example, Omar Barghouti, a perpetual student at Tel Aviv University masquerading as the "Palestinian" face of the boycott movement, and Ali Abunimah, the ranting head of an organization that calls itself Electronic Intifada, who spreads myths of Palestinian victimization from the comfort of Chicago.

Like Haman and his gang in the Purim story, the leaders of BDS warfare had a run of successes, but appear to be losing momentum and may be headed, if not to the gallows, at least to the dustbin of history. In Britain, where hatred of Israel and Jews flourishes, the government recently prohibited the boycott of Israeli products and firms by any public body, citing anti-discrimination laws. The Paris municipality confirmed a parallel policy, while in Spain, which has spawned a number of radical anti-Israel hate groups, the city of Aviles backed down from a boycott after facing legal action.

In the United States, a number of states have passed legislation prohibiting boycotts of Israel, and Congress included an anti-BDS clause in important trade legislation, instructing negotiators to give high priority to this issue in talks with the European Union. The EU has singled out Israel by requiring the special labelling of products from "occupied territories" – which is a preliminary form of BDS, designed to pave the way for boycotts of Israeli banks and other institutions. Going further, Congress is debating the Combating BDS Act of 2016, which would reinforce the power of state and local governments to "identify and divest from entities engaged in BDS activities against Israel."

In a similar spirit, the Canadian House of Commons' voted 229-51 in favour of a strong resolution calling on the government to denounce and condemn the BDS movement, which, as a columnist noted "has become such high fashion among the anti-Israel crowd in Canada." The resolution, which was introduced by the Conservative opposition, was supported by the governing Liberals (the NDP voted against it).

And on a number of university campuses, there are signs that tolerance for BDS hate and the wider demonization of Israel is thinning out. Recently, McGill University students rejected a BDS resolution in an online vote involving thousands of students. In contrast to the resolutions steered by marginal radicals, led by Arab and Muslim activists with a thin veneer of fringe Jews, when the general student population is involved, they reject this immoral form of warfare. Some of the inadvertent funders are also clamping down: a major law firm that gave student groups at the Harvard Law School a $1-million donation changed course after learning that some of the money went to promote campaigns that single out Israel.

These successes are impressive, but they don't mean the threat has passed or that the BDS war has been defeated and we can celebrate another victory of good over evil, as in the Purim saga. The BDS money continues to flow, and as some government funders in Europe close the taps, others – particularly the trustees of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund in New York – are playing the role of Achashverosh in affixing their seals to absurd decrees (in the form of grant requests from BDS groups). We are at best half-way through the Megillah, after Mordechai realizes that the Jews are in danger, but before Esther succeeds in destroying Haman, winning over the king, and saving the day. ■

Wave of Palestinian terror shows no signs of abating

NOGA TARNOPOLSKY
JERUSALEM

Eyewitnesses to the point-blank shooting of two Jerusalem police officers March 8 on a main east Jerusalem street described a remarkable scene. One shopkeeper said it was "like the Wild West, but right outside my door."

Mid-morning on the day following the attacks, Salah Ad-Din Street, which would normally be thrumming with street traffic, was all but deserted with at least half of its shops shuttered.

Merchants were cautious and fearful. "Are you a police investigator?" one asked The Media Line.

Ibrahim Moaket, who with his brother Faez runs a spice shop on the very corner where the police officers were felled, described how "everyone heard the shots. First thing we did was close the [metallic] shutters."

Their shop had been full of clients that Tuesday afternoon. "This thing that happened, the shooting," Ibrahim said, "its not good. It's terrible. For all of us."

Imad Muna, one of two brothers who own the Educational Bookshop, a popular café/bookstore, described handing a customer a book "and while I was giving it to him, I heard the first shot." He said that most of his customers ran upstairs to the cafeteria while he ran to the window to see what was going on.

He saw a man standing with his legs planted wide apart, both hands firmly holding a gun, shooting at a pair of police officers across the narrow street.

> This cannot be viewed by civilized people as an appropriate way to behave.
> U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden

"I saw him running down the road and a shootout started. For 10 or 15 minutes there was shooting and police cars, motorbikes and horses flooded the street. "I heard at least a hundred live bullets. I saw the injured cop lying on the ground at the corner."

The dramatic events witnessed by Muna in the late afternoon came at the same time U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden was landing in Israel.

The rapid sequence of attacks comes at a time when the uprising of Palestinian "lone wolf" attackers enters its sixth month, with no signs of a cessation.

In one of Tuesday night's attacks, a U.S. citizen, 29-year-old Vanderbilt graduate student Taylor Force, was stabbed to death in Tel Aviv.

By midday the next day, only hours before Biden was scheduled to meet with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority had issued no condemnation of the attacks.

Israeli leaders across the board assailed the violence and the lack of Palestinian reaction.

Speaking to journalists as he exited the meeting with Biden, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said "unfortunately it's not just that President Abbas refused to condemn these terror attacks, his Fatah party actually praised the murderer of an American citizen as a Palestinian martyr and a hero."

Netanyahu was referring to Palestine TV broadcasts that referred to Bashar Masalha, the 22-year-old stabber, as a "martyr." One report described the attack in which Force died as "a complex operation ...carried out by a martyr."

Biden, at the same press briefing, started out by saying that "the United States condemns these acts and condemns the failure to condemn them. This cannot become an accepted modus operandi.

"This cannot be viewed by civilized people as an appropriate way to behave. This is not tolerable in the 21st century. The U.S. stands firmly by Israel's right to defend itself."

Almost concurrent with the Biden-Netanyahu meeting, a double shooting attack took place in Jerusalem, with two terrorists initially taking aim at a bus full of passengers. For reasons that remain unclear, the pair desisted, fled in a car and continued shooting several kilometres away, near Jerusalem's Old City.

An Arab Israeli man was severely wounded when he was shot in the head. Both shooters were later killed by police.

On Salah Ad-Din Street, Asil, a young girl in a headscarf, walked into a chocolate shop and admitted that she was "a little afraid to be out on the street." Most residents were less courageous and stayed at home.

Shopkeepers described the scene the night before, as police forced them to lock up, keeping them on site for two hours as they went door-by-door checking the cellphones and ID cards of sellers and customers in the vicinity.

Tamer Izhiman, who together with his brothers and his father, Adli, operates the coffee and chocolate shop that bears the family name, foresees a loss of "90 per cent of our business for the next week, and 50 per cent for the next month."

Speaking with The Media Line Izhiman described an active and enthusiastic social media scene that Tuesday night, with young Palestinians gleefully claiming to know the shooter of the two policemen, both of whom remain hospitalized in serious condition. "Everyone gets on Facebook saying 'he's from my neighbourhood!' or 'no, he's from my neighbourhood!' because the guy shot at cops and didn't kill innocent people on the street."

Not all Palestinians feel this way, he added. "Some people care more about their business. About their families." ■

Jewish Life

Prize winner influenced by great-grandfather's legacy

STEPHEN CERA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like anyone else, a musician's genealogy can hold some surprises.

Last September, first prize of the Honens Piano Competition in Calgary, was awarded to a 22-year-old Italian pianist, Luca Buratto, the youngest of 10 semifinalists. This was reportedly the world's largest piano prize: $100,000, plus a comprehensive artistic and career development program valued at half a million dollars.

It turns out that the Prize Laureate has a partially Jewish background.

Buratto had first caught the public's attention in 2003, at the age of nine, when, at the Milan Conservatory's Sala Verdi, he performed music composed by his great-grandfather, Renzo Massarani, at an International Holocaust Remembrance Day event.

Massarani (1898-1975), a student of composer Ottorino Respighi, was a promising young composer whose career was interrupted by the imposition of racial laws in 1938.

"My great-grandfather had to stop writing music because he was Jewish," says Buratto. "And in Italy before World War II, his music was banned. Though he survived the war and the persecution, he decided to stop writing music because he was disgusted with mankind." Massarani ended up in Rio de Janeiro as a music reviewer.

During earlier and better times in Italy, Massarani was the music director of a famous puppet theatre, the Teatro dei Piccoli, and travelled widely with them during the 1920s.

Buratto's grandfather (on his mother's side) is Jewish, however this grandfather was the only one of his siblings to marry a Catholic. (Luca's mother grew up Catholic and so did Luca.) However they always celebrate the major Jewish holidays even though his grandfather was not observant. (Luca has close relatives who are Jewish: a cousin of his mother is Orthodox, and one of his cousins lives in Israel where he is studying to become a rabbi.)

Massarani decided not to publish more music after immigrating to Brazil, and in fact wanted to destroy his music. Luca has played some of his chamber works, usually in performances tied to the January 27 International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Massarani's story mirrors the vexed plight of Jews in Fascist Italy. Benito Mussolini, the founder of modern fascism, wrote in the newspaper Il Popolo d'Italia in 1920: "In Italy there is absolutely no differentiation between Jews and non-Jews, in all fields, from religion to politics to the military to the economy...Italian Jews have their new Zion here, in this adorable land of ours." But one year earlier, Mussolini had inveighed in the same newspaper against the powers of "International Judaism."

A more recent article by Gregorio Nardi, "The 'Aryanization' of Italian Musical Life", suggests that for musicians, the ominous signal came at the end of 1933 in the form of a ban on radio broadcasts of pieces by Jewish composers. Until then, new prospects seemed to be appearing for younger Jewish composers such as Massarani. Ironically, the Mantua-born Massarani was at one time considered a representative of fascist officialdom; he had participated in the March on Rome, and despite Nazi policies his "Danza Atletica" was entered in the international music competition at the 1936 Berlin Olympics.

But that same year, specific racist policies were implemented, then consolidated in 1938 with the promulgation of the so-called Racial Laws. Individuals "belonging to the Hebrew race" were expelled from public positions, Jewish performers were banned from concert halls, as were works by Jewish composers. When his music was proscribed, Massarani departed for Brazil, where he did all he could to ensure that his works would never be played. He left just in time: as of June 1940, Jews were being interned in Italian concentration camps.

This painful legacy of his great-grandfather has affected Luca Buratto, who says "this has been a big influence on me." Meanwhile, his debut CD recording has just been released on the Honens' own label. Another solo recording, on the prestigious Hyperion label, is due to be released next year, when Buratto will also make his debuts in Carnegie Hall and London's Wigmore Hall. ■

DIVORCE AND ADULTERY

Family Matters

It makes no difference what causes the split. I can't count the number of times a new client will come to me with the details of their spouse's infidelity. "I came home one day and he/she was with my best friend. What was that? I could never forgive him/her." Surprisingly, Canadian law no longer rewards catching your spouse in flagrante delicto. You don't get extra spousal support, better rights to your kids, such as custody or more access. You also don't get a bigger slice of the pie. I recall a BC Judge awarding one lady compensation for severe mental suffering because her husband was having an affair. But that was an oddball case. Generally the Courts don't' make such rulings because under Canada's Divorce Act conduct can't play any role in calculating spousal support.

Normally, a spouse waits one year from the date of separation to obtain a divorce order. So the only "benefit" under the Act when a spouse claims for a divorce based on adultery is that he/she is entitled to a divorce without waiting out the year. However, this benefit has little practical benefit. Most people who are the victims of adultery are hardly in an emotional place where they are ready to remarry right away. It usually takes at least a year for many people to readjust and socially reintegrate after being the victim of an adulterous affair in any event. However, for the adulterer, it may be a great benefit, since if his spouse wants a quicker divorce then, in some cases, the adulterer gets a license to consummate his adultery legally by marrying the person with whom he or she has been cheating much earlier than expected. I would imagine that this is hardly the result that was anticipated when these amendments were enacted. In any event, most Courts are so slow that it can easily take 6 months or longer even if you claim adultery and the other side doesn't oppose: and it often costs a lot more. So, why not just wait out the year?

Adultery usually traumatizes but the reaction will vary. You can only bend a tree so far. Some try marriage counselling. Others leave the marriage as quick as a rabbit. And then there are those who feel so dependent, so trapped by their economic or social circumstances that their fear traps them. They internalize their hurt, look the other way and fall into the hole of denial. If you find it hard to believe that someone can actually live this way, try to fill their shoes. Some spouses live this nightmare for years and many never break loose.

If you know of anyone quietly suffering, be a good friend. It's a very lonely experience, akin to the death of someone close. His or her entire family and many people you've known suddenly disappear. And the law simply no longer gives any remedy.

Frozen Chosen make first appearance at Friars' Briar

plungen@thecjn.ca

No one can ever know for sure what God is thinking, but it's likely that when he made the Jews his Chosen People, it wasn't because of their ability to draw the four-foot circle or execute a raise takeout.

No, not at all. It was pretty clear from their 0-5 record to start the annual Friars' Briar and their assignment to the relegation round that the "Frozen Chosen" are much better at matters of faith than in faithfully performing on the pebbled ice.

Perhaps they were daunted by the presence on the ice of a rather un-kosher sounding "hog line," but still, the four Toronto-area Jewish clergymen and woman, who adopted the "Frozen Chosen" moniker for the tournament, managed to win Game 1 of the relegation round. In doing so they defeated a team from Winnipeg, where curling is, if not a religion, then something pretty close.

They managed to go 3-0 in the relegation round playoffs, winning the Hugh Christmas Award.

Contacted in Ottawa, where the tournament runs parallel to the Tim Hortons Brier, Rabbi Cory Weiss was upbeat and full of good humour, enjoying the camaraderie of his teammates and opponents.

"Everybody is in good spirits," Rabbi Weiss said on the phone, no doubt referring to something other than curling's post-game ritual of imbibing frothy beverages.

The Friars' Briar brings together rinks from across Canada, and this year, for the first time since the genesis of the event in 1978, Jews joined their Christian confreres in sliding granite rocks down pebbled ice.

Rabbis Jerry Steinberg (of B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah in Ajax, third), Michael Dolgin (Temple Sinai, skip), Weiss (Temple Har Zion, second) and Cantor Katie Oringel (Temple Sinai, lead) made up the Frozen Chosen.

Interestingly, of the four, only Rabbi Steinberg grew up playing the sport, in his hometown of Regina. The others, all originally from the United States, are Moshe-come-latelies to the game.

The four play on separate rinks once a week in the Greater Toronto Interfaith Curling Club, but teamed together for the national bonspiel.

Playing only once a week is a bit of a handicap, conceded Rabbi Weiss, especially when the other rinks play more often. But that didn't take away from the collegiality and fun of playing with other men and women of faith.

Asked if HaShem might have a stake in who wins the event, Rabbi Weiss said, "It's all in God's hands. Prayer and faith have a lot to do with it. But everybody here has prayer and faith. God doesn't takes sides in curling."

True enough, but a few more brachot and mitzvahs wouldn't hurt.

As it happened, the schedule for the Friars' Briar couldn't have come at a better time. Because it was held relatively close to Toronto and didn't fall on Purim, the four holy throwers could get together and see their dream come true.

Although Rabbi Steinberg's curling pedigree goes back to his high school in Regina, where a school janitor created a shortened sheet of ice and the kids crafted rocks out of tin cans and cement, the others came on board in just the last few years.

Before their weekly games at the Annandale Golf & Curling Club in Ajax, the religious leaders get together for a shmeer and shmooze.

"It's my favourite morning of the week," said Rabbi Weiss. "I love the collegiality and the friendliness."

Sometimes they're joined by Christian clergy, and they acknowledge the weekly games helps create fraternal bonds between members of the two faith groups.

Rabbi Weiss points to a number of joint programs held by synagogues and churches, such as concerts and pulpit exchanges.

As for the Friars' Briar, Rabbi Steinberg said, "It's been a good experience. It's created a lot of good relationships between Christian clergy and us."

Next time around, other religious representatives might take part. Rabbi Steinberg has invited an imam from the local Islamic society to participate.

If one day you hear him tell his congregation, "Hurry, whoa, hard, hard, hard, whoa, whoa," he might have taken another step in adopting to native Canadian curling culture. ■

Dershowitz's take on the world's first Jewish lawyer

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Prof. Alan Dershowitz of Harvard University is a scholar and activist that the Jewish community can be proud of. He has dedicated his life to the pursuit of human rights for Jews and others, while at the same time establishing an impressive record as a criminal lawyer. He is also a strong and effective defender of Israel on campuses and beyond.

The author of over 30 books, Dershowitz's latest offering is Abraham: The World's First (but Certainly not Last) Jewish Lawyer. Dershowitz provides a unique analysis of the Abraham stories in the Bible, with frequent references to how they were understood in the Jewish tradition.

Two Bible stories about Abraham are central to the thesis of the book. For Dershowitz, Abraham's speech to God about the impending destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah was his finest hour. Abraham challenged God, "Will You sweep away the innocent along with the guilty?" He spoke truth to power, demanding that God exercise justice and fairness: "Far be it from You to do such a thing, to bring death upon the innocent as well as the guilty, so that innocent and guilty fare alike. Far be it from You! Shall not the Judge of all the earth deal justly?" (Genesis 18:23, 25).

Dershowitz feels that Abraham fell short in the story that appears a few chapters later in Genesis 22, when God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son, Isaac. Abraham acquiesced too willingly, according to Dershowitz. He should have argued against God for giving him this patently immoral order. Instead he behaved like a religious fundamentalist, not a compliment in Dershowitz's worldview.

Jewish, Muslim and Christian traditions consistently praise Abraham's selfless behaviour and deep faith in God as demonstrated in the story, but Dershowitz's atypical understanding underlies the rest of the book, his survey of Jewish lawyers through the ages. He praises the ones who ostensibly follow the model of Abraham, courageously arguing with God, and criticizes those he sees as unthinkingly following the law.

Among the meritorious Jewish lawyers, Canada's own Irwin Cotler gets special mention, with lengthy praise for Cotler's commitment to human rights for Jews and others. Dershowitz quotes from a letter he wrote, nominating Cotler for the Nobel Peace Prize. And he dedicates the book to Cotler, "a modern-day Abraham... who boldly confront[s] injustice and who aggressively demand[s] a single standard of justice."

This book is part of the "Jewish Encounters" series published jointly by Schocken and Nextbooks. I have previously reviewed here the volumes dedicated to Rashi, Hillel, and Yehuda Halevi. All the books in the series are reasonably well written, and most are authored by Jews with some name recognition.

Unfortunately, none of the books about pre-modern Jews were assigned to authors with expertise in pre-modern Judaism. For some reason, authors of books about the modern period are often genuine subject matter experts.

Dershowitz tries hard to overcome his lack of expert background in classical Judaica. He is, without a doubt, a knowledgeable and educated Jew, and he has relied on a number of research assistants with subject expertise, whose help he graciously acknowledges. He also wisely spends only the first 54 pages of Abraham talking about Abraham. For those who might wonder if there is enough to write about Abraham to fill more than 54 pages, I recommend an excellent new Hebrew book, Abraham: A Story of a Journey, by a rising Israeli academic and rabbi, Jonathan Grossman, written for both scholarly and lay audiences (566 pages, published by Yedioth Ahronoth Books), a book that builds careful literary readings of the Abraham stories upon expert knowledge of the ancient near east and the rabbinic tradition. I hope it will be translated into English so it can reach a wider audience.

Dershowitz is indeed an expert on the bulk of his book, the survey of Jewish lawyers through the ages. And his references to Abraham and Jewish tradition contain only a few gaffes. One example: Dershowitz presents an English quotation from Maimonides' Book of Commandments as "translated from the original Hebrew." Maimonides did not write his Book of Commandments in Hebrew, but in Judeo-Arabic.

The attraction of Jews to the study and practice of the law may be traceable in some sense to Abraham, as Dershowitz suggests. At the end of the book he mentions another possibility: "I chose to become a criminal lawyer at least in part because I am Jewish. I was taught from the earliest age that Jews must always remember that they were persecuted and that they must stand up for those who now face persecution."

Perhaps another reason for Jews' attraction to the law lies in the centuries-old ultimate Jewish intellectual pursuit: study of the Talmud, which was always seen as a way of coming to understand this world, and God's blueprint for it. Any synagogue, yeshiva, or school where Jews study Talmud exposes them to contracts, agency, torts, and criminal law from a young age, thus encouraging us to think like lawyers. Arguing with God, as Abraham did, has a place in Jewish tradition, but much smaller than the place of study of God's law. ■

Israeli trio make a splash in Yemeni-Arabic

jshupac@thecjn.ca

A-Wa has seen a steady rise to fame in Israel and beyond. TAL GIVONY PHOTO

Tair, Liron and Tagel Haim, three sisters raised in a small village in southern Israel, recognized that it would be safer to release their breakout album in Hebrew or English, but instead they decided to record it in Yemeni-Arabic.

"We decided to go with it and do things our own way and, thank God, people are enjoying it and have received it well," says Tair, the spokesperson for A-Wa.

A-Wa has seen a steady rise to fame in Israel and abroad since last year, when their single Habib Galbi became the first ever full Arabic-language song to top the Israeli charts.

In addition to their success in Israel, A-Wa has begun to cultivate a following in the Arab world and in Europe, and this month, they embark on their debut North American tour, with a performance at Toronto's Mod Club presented by the Ashkenaz Foundation.

All 12 tracks on the debut album, which was produced by Tomer Yosef of Israeli musical group Balkan Beat Box, are in Yemeni-Arabic, a dialect spoken by Yemeni Jews. Further, all are takes on traditional Yemeni folk songs, but fused with funk, reggae, electronica and hip-hop.

The sisters, whose grandparents went to Israel from Yemen as teenagers in a 1949 rescue operation, grew up exposed to Yemeni music and culture, as well as the Yemeni-Arabic dialect.

Tair recalls going to visit them in their home in the centre of Israel and seeing, "the Yemenite women drumming on tin drums and singing and hearing our grandpa praying with the exact Yemenite pronunciation."

She said they felt a particular affinity for the original folk songs that form the foundation of their album, as all were part of an oral tradition created and passed on through the generations by Jewish Yemeni women, who were typically illiterate and prohibited from participating in synagogue services with men.

"They created their own folklore. These are secular songs written about love, hatred, their expectations and dreams. It was like an outlet. From generation to generation, one woman would take a song and add a verse or slightly change the melody – that's the characteristic of the oral tradition," Tair explained.

The sisters are part of a family of six siblings who grew up in Israel's Arava Valley, near the Egyptian border.

In a home infused with myriad musical influences, from jazz, R&B and Motown to traditional Greek and Yemeni music, all three sisters studied music and dance and eventually began meeting up at their childhood home to record music, which they would film and upload to YouTube.

It was there that Yosef, who also has Yemeni roots, discovered them and came to collaborate with the sisters on the album.

The music video for Habib Galbi, which Yosef directed and shot in the desert, saw A-Wa go viral, garnering 2.5 million views.

"I think we're very original and surprising to people," Tair said. "Because all of a sudden, they're seeing three young ladies that sing like three old ladies with Yemenite songs, fully in Arabic, and then it tops the charts in Israel. It's crazy. People are accepting us a lot, and we don't take that for granted."

While one might be tempted to read A-Wa's music as political, given that they're arguably breaking ground for bringing Arabic and elements of non-Ashkenazi culture to Israel's mainstream, Tair said, "I do think the Mizrachi culture is more well known and better accepted nowadays. We really just do what we love and what feels right. Rather than a political message I think we bring more of a social message, of freedom, and of encouraging people to be comfortable in their own skin. Also, we want to empower women and bring people together."

While traditional Yemeni music was heavily vocally-based and not accompanied by instruments other than drums, making it, Tair stressed, "very rhythmic, very groovy," A-Wa has added diverse genres of music to the songs and vocal harmonies, also not a component of the Yemeni tradition.

"In a way, we feel like we're continuing on the oral tradition of Yemeni women by taking these folk songs and telling the old stories but with a new perspective, a new twist," Tair said. ■

A-Wa peforms at the Mod Club Theatre in Toronto on March 20. For tickets go to ashkenaz.ca or at the door.

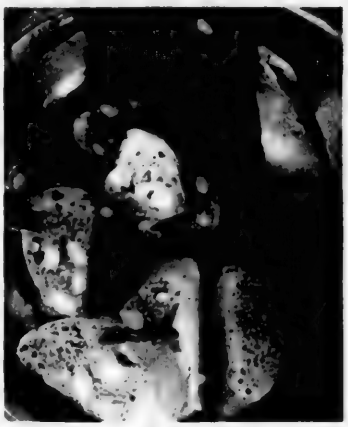
Purim, Sephardi-Style

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



If you grew up in an Ashkenazi Jewish family, you probably ate traditional hamantashen filled with sweet poppy seed filling, prunes, or jam. Recent updates include filling them with Israeli chocolate spread, a Hershey's Kiss, or a spoonful of chocolate chip cookie dough. Some families like a cookie-type dough, while others prefer to use sweet yeast dough.

However, if you grew up in a Sephardi Jewish family, your Purim traditions were definitely different. Linda Capeloto Sendowski of Beverly Hills, Calif., author of Sephardic Baking from Nona and More Favorites shares some of her favourite Purim recipes as well as other Sephardi specialties.

Folares

Dough

- ❑ 5 cups all-purpose unbleached flour
- ❑ 2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 cup Parmesan cheese, grated
- ❑ 1 cup ice water
- ❑ 3/4 cup safflower or sunflower oil

Eggs

- ❑ 21 extra large, hard-boiled eggs (optional: dye eggs blue, following dying kit instructions)

Place flour in a large bowl, add salt and Parmesan and stir. In a bowl or two-cup glass measure, add ice water and then whisk in oil. Add liquid to flour mixture and combine with your hands. Dough should be pliable but not too soft.

Divide dough into 21 portions. Break off a walnut-sized piece from each portion and roll into a smooth ball. Flatten ball into a disc about 2 1/2–3 in. in diameter with a rolling pin or your hand. Placed cooked, coloured egg in centre of disc. With the remaining dough from each portion, roll out two or three ropes, 1/3 in. in diameter and long enough to go from one side of the disc to the other. Twist the rope and then attach it to one side of the disc, stretch it over the egg, and attach to the other side of the disc. This creates a cage over the egg. Twist ropes for a better look.

Heat oven to 400. Place folares on parchment-lined rimmed baking sheet. Bake until dough is golden brown and crisp, about 15 to 20 minutes. Enjoy warm or at room temperature. Yield: About 21 folares

Pistachio biscotti

That first bite of biscotti is sublime. These are just sweet enough, with a subtle blend of flavours that will not interfere with your demitasse of espresso, and crisp enough to withstand dunking in hot tea. Pistachios, dried cherries and orange rind make a great taste combination. Linda's family enjoys them, and she likes to put them in little bags to give away or add them to her Purim platicos.

- ❑ 6 cups all-purpose unbleached flour, plus 1 additional cup for kneading
- ❑ 2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 2 tsp. ground anise
- ❑ 2 tbsp. fresh lemon zest
- ❑ 2 tsp. sea salt
- ❑ 4 extra large eggs
- ❑ 2 1/2 cups sugar
- ❑ 1 cup sunflower oil
- ❑ 2 tbsp. lemon juice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. orange juice
- ❑ 2 1/2 cups unsalted pistachios, ground
- ❑ 1 cup tart dried cherries, chopped into medium pieces
- ❑ 3/4 cup whole unsalted pistachios

Preheat oven to 350. Line rimmed baking sheets with parchment paper. Combine 6 cups of flour, baking powder, anise, zest, and salt in a medium bowl and set aside. Place eggs in bowl of a stand mixer. Add sugar and beat on medium speed until light in colour and thick and smooth. Add oil. Beat, starting at lowest speed and increasing until medium, until well combined. Add lemon and orange juice and mix. Add ground pistachios and mix then, add flour mixture. Mix on lowest speed until flour is incorporated. Lastly, add dried cherries and pistachios and mix until just distributed.

Remove dough from mixer bowl and place on a wooden or stone work surface dusted with flour. Dough may be slightly sticky. Knead dough gently until smooth and easy to work with, adding some or all of the final cup of flour. Roll dough into a smooth ball, flatten, and slice into four equal pieces. With your hands, form four logs, about 2 x 10-in. each. Carefully place two logs on each baking sheet. Bake 25 to 28 minutes or until golden.

Remove baking sheets from oven and turn temperature down to 200. Carefully remove logs from baking sheets and place on a large cutting board without breaking them. Immediately cut them on a sharp diagonal, with a long serrated knife, about 1/4- to -1/3- in. thick.

Carefully return sliced biscotti to baking sheets, lined with clean parchment paper, with enough space between them so air can circulate all around them. You will need additional baking sheets, as once sliced, biscotti will take up more room.

Toast biscotti in a 200 oven for 2 hours. Turn off oven and leave biscotti in closed oven overnight. They should be crisp. Store in an airtight tin. Yield: 60 to 80 biscotti

- Tip: Linda always bakes her biscotti after dinner. After baking and slicing, she puts a timer on the oven for 2 hours, for toasting, and then it shuts off automatically. Biscotti can stay in the oven all night.
- Note: Biscotti always looks underbaked when sliced, but they will finish baking and dry out during the toasting time. ■

Presentations take you back to the golden age of radio

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Those who are 55 years or over may remember The Lone Ranger, The Shadow, The Lux Radio Theatre and many more memorable radio programs. You can now go down the memory lane of radio with The Golden Age of Radio Guys, a nostalgic live program created by Ken Borden and David Himelfarb.

The duo, who have both been involved in the media for more than half a century and both love old radio shows, present their unique programs at seniors residences, synagogues and social engagements – performing for anyone from that era.

"They love us because we take them back to their age of innocence where everything was fun, light and simple, and the happiest days of their lives," Borden says.

"Our presentation of four decades of radio programs from the 1930s to 1960s, is still alive and well in our audiences' memories.

"When we refresh that memory, they come alive," he added. "They smile, sing along and poke each other as they recognize familiar voices and sounds. And after our one-hour presentation, we receive many questions and requests."

He notes that he has met many of the early stars of radio, performers of the past. "The best performers of all time. The audience loves to hear all about their old friends on radio."

Borden, a multi-talented ad-man, artist and broadcaster, has one of the world's largest Old Time Radio (OTR) collections. He works with U.S. OTR groups on a daily basis.

Himelfarb, a retired creative ad-man says, "The reactions of our various audiences have been nothing short of amazing. Not only do we play the many radio clips for them, but we also give them a little background information about what they are about to hear.

"And we make our presentations interactive. This makes the sound even more meaningful and they often chime in with any personal stories that refer to the clips that we are playing"

NOW Magazine described Borden and Himelfarb's presentations as "The best feel-good show in town for seniors."

Their presentation is filled with nostalgia, humour, music and suspense, with shows including The Jimmy Durante Show, Fred Allen, Inner Sanctum, Amos 'n Andy, Wayne and Shuster and The Happy Gang.

"We are also turned on by the audience's involvement with the golden oldies. We love what we do," Himelfarb told The CJN. ■

New Canadian immigrants bring hope, guns

David Levine

When Amira Hassan first arrived in Canada with her husband and two children, she was shocked to see a throng of citizens gathered to welcome them and their fellow refugees.

"I had never really heard of Canada," she says. "I'm embarrassed to say it, but we didn't get much education about the world outside our borders."

Amira and her family are among the untold scores of refugees who have sought asylum in Canada, escaping a destabilized country on the brink of disaster.

"Canada is beautiful, and so welcoming," she says. "It's like a dream. I keep worrying that I'll suddenly wake up back in Minnesota."

As the American presidential election nears, Google is reporting that searches for the phrase "moving to Canada" have increased by 1,000 per cent – a statistic that only scratches the surface of a mass emigration already underway.

Cheat Sheet: The United States of America is a federal republic composed of 50 states, plus several bonus territories, mostly located between Canada and Mexico.*

With its head of state set to step down in 2017, a billionaire jester and former television personality, known for his distinctive orange headdress and immunity to shame, has declared his intention to thwart the supposedly rightful ascension of a political dynasty currently in exile.

The polarized political landscape has already crippled regional governance of this once-great nation, the birthplace of jazz, the automobile and comedian Kathy Griffin.

Like so many American refugees, uncertainty swirled around Amira and her family when they decided to leave their home in Duluth, setting out on an ancient and untended interstate, their journey involving weeks of detours with the aim of avoiding methane fires and roving presidential pollsters, all in the hope of starting a new life north of the border.

And they're not alone. Bill and Nancy Taylor have been living in their car for three weeks, waiting at the border crossing in Niagara Falls, N.Y., sleeping in their car and rationing the last few gallons of their Big Gulp to survive.

Bill says there's no looking back.

"We have no home to go back to. The soil in our town was fracked to a pulp. Our town hall has been at the bottom of a sinkhole since 2011. Our city council meets in a Walmart break room, but half the town can't get there because the bridge collapsed. Canada is our only hope."

The Canadian response has been mixed: despite the government's commitment and hundreds of communities that have come together to sponsor American families, the waiting list stands at more than 100,000 names and threatens to overwhelm Canadian resources.

The absorption process alone is complex: new immigrants must spend six weeks learning about their new country – units include contrition, apologizing, avoiding confrontation and Tim Hortons.

For many refugees, options are limited. Countries around the world have closed their borders, citing "cultural differences" that would make mass immigration impossible.

"When America sends its people, they're not sending the best," one foreign minister told The CJN. "They're sending people with lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with them. They're bringing guns. They're bringing OxyContin. They're bringing Type 2 diabetes. And some, I assume, are good people."

Some refugees, impatient with Canada's "women and children first" policy, have turned to a budding network of Canadian "coyotes" – or "moose-herders," as they're known here – to smuggle them across the world's longest unprotected border.

Steven G. arrived in Canada illegally and says the journey still haunts him.

"I'll never forget that field we had to walk through," he says, calling it "the longest six minutes of my life."

"But it was worth it, no question," he's quick to add. "Back where I'm from, the mayor got high on bath salts and decided to replace our city's water supply with Mountain Dew Kickstart. I'm just excited to be living in a country where nothing happens." ■

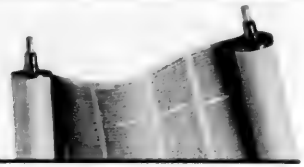
Parshah

Vayikra | Leviticus 1:1-5:26



Rabbi Aaron Katchen says the fight against Amalek is an ideological battle, not a physical one
Rabbi Michal Shekel argues that the BDS movement is actually the modern iteration of Amalek
Rabbi Howard Morrison takes a closer look at the four mitzvot that surround the Purim holiday

Aaron Katchen

"Remember what Amalek did to you on your journey, after you left Egypt... you shall blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven. Do not forget!" (Deuteronomy 25:17-19)

We read Parshat Zachor on the Shabbat before Purim, when we are reminded of Amalek's attempted genocide on the Jewish People as we left Egypt and are confronted with the obligation to destroy Amalek. Many of the ancient tribes were mixed together through wars in antiquity, including Amalek and 10 of the tribes of Israel. If we can no longer find Amalek, why do we still have the command to remember to destroy Amalek?

Rabbi Yehuda Amital (1924-2010) gives a compelling answer. For Rabbi Amital, in today's world, the destruction of Amalek is an ideological battle and not a physical battle. Amalek represents a world run by chance and randomness – a postmodern world of moral relativism where there is no sense of truth and no hierarchy of values. Amalek is not the presence of evil, but the ability to obfuscate it.

When confronting Amalek, Rabbi Amital warns us that we must confront the ideas and not the people. We must not see those who espouse ideas that differ from ours as puppets or caricatures, but real people with real concerns. Only once we care about those people as people, can we hope to have an impact on them.

Secondly, Rabbi Amital reminds us not to be haughty in our staunch convictions. It is not that I am right and everyone else is "wandering in the desert." For Rabbi Amital, because faith is hard to prove and it is only through the grace of God that one can feel faith, we must be humble in our faith. Once we have achieved this real humility, we can confront Amalek – not the people, but their destructive ideas. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

Zachor: "Remember what Amalek did to you" (Deuteronomy, 25:17) is a commandment seared in our souls.

In university, I was regularly called a Nazi (and worse) by people who disagreed with the information I handed out at my university's Hillel table. In the 1980s, as a campus professional, I recall a popular feminist speaker lamenting to my Jewish students the anti-Semitism of her academic peers, who embraced her as a feminist and lesbian, but not as a Jew.

Today's Amalek wears the garb of the BDS movement – it is a bigoted, devious, sinister creature whose tactics have become increasingly sophisticated and subtle. Point out an anti-Israeli phrase on its website, and the wording will disappear. It constantly creates new guises, gaining support from well-meaning folks by cloaking its true aims in new organizational names and seemingly innocuous words.

While there is much publicity about the hard work done by Jewish students and their on-campus allies in facing Amalek, we rarely hear about another group who confront Amalek on a daily basis for years on end: faculty. (Full disclosure: My husband is a university professor.)

Among university faculty, the zealous supporters of BDS seem to be concentrated in the humanities and social sciences. These are the areas where you also find Jewish studies programs. While enriching our knowledge of the Jewish world, Jewish studies faculty members strive to raise awareness among their colleagues while battling the BDS Amalek. They do not sit in ivory towers but are continually on the frontlines.

Campus events have led many of us to withdraw support for our alma maters, but Jewish life on campus needs our assistance. This is best done by directing our support to Jewish student groups and Jewish studies programs, the organizations that go beyond zachor (remember) and actively fulfil shamor (guard). ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

Is there an interrelationship between the book of Leviticus and the special theme of Shabbat Zachor, the Sabbath prior to Purim?

When one thinks of a Jewish holiday that is popular among children, Purim certainly comes to mind. What child doesn't wish to dress in costume, make a lot of noise at the mention of Haman's name, give and receive food portions, and attend a festive celebration? For me personally, I think of my youth when I think of Purim. As child, I dressed up as a biblical character or a superhero for the Megillah reading. I accompanied my mother during the day of Purim, dropping off mishloach manot by the front door of neighbours and friends. My local synagogue or a private home hosted the festive meal, which always involved a lot of "shtick." I remember being told by my parents after receiving so much "chametz" snack food on Purim that I had exactly a month to eat it all before it had to be removed for Pesach.

While the beginning of Leviticus will always contain a historical and philosophical lesson for children about sacrifices we're willing to make for Judaism and the world we live in, it's ironic and appropriate that the third book of the Torah coincides with the Shabbat prior to Purim, a wonderful occasion on which to immerse children in the joy of being Jewish.

There are four beautiful mitzvot that surround the observance of Purim. One commentator neatly describes them all with the same first letter, so that they're easier to remember: 1) mikrah Megillah – the reading of the Book of Esther, 2) mishloach manot – the sending of food portions, 3) matanot le'evyonim – gifts to the poor, and 4) mishteh – the festive meal. The four mitzvot illustrate important values of Judaism through which we can immerse our children in the richness of Judaism as we begin to read the third book of the Torah. ■

Sharon Abraham-Weiss wants a more democratic Israel

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Sharon Abraham-Weiss has been executive director of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) since June 2014. The non-profit organization advocates for freedom of speech and expression, minority rights, the status of refugees and asylum seekers, access to basic services like water and electricity, and an end to discriminatory housing practices.

In addition to her work as the former equal employment opportunities commissioner at the Ministry of Economy, Abraham-Weiss was also a founder and a board member of Itach-Maaki – Women Lawyers for Social Justice, and was named one of Israel's 66 most prominent female leaders by Ha'aretz in 2014.

Abraham-Weiss spoke to The CJN in advance of her March 13-14 visits to Toronto and Vancouver at the invitation of the New Israel Fund Canada, to talk about the work ACRI does to promote human rights in Israel.

Tell me about your history with ACRI and your accomplishments before becoming its executive director in 2014.

I started with the organization as a legal intern. ACRI was established in 1972 by North American liberals who had ideas of civil liberties in the United States. The model was based on the American Civil Liberties Union, an NGO that deals with human rights. There were a couple things happening in Israel. The occupation was in 1967 and also there were clashes between Mizrachi and Ashkenazi Jews.

Its main work in the beginning was legal work, so we would take things to the Supreme Court regarding civil liberties and human rights. It is the largest human rights organization and the oldest, best-known and established doing this work in Israel.

I left ACRI in 2008. I went to teach at one of the law schools, about corporate social responsibility, and later I became the equal employment opportunities commissioner – a position I held for five years prior to my current position – working for the government, the Ministry of Economy.

What are some of Israel's most pressing social issues?

We have a department that deals with social and political liberties, but today, the biggest challenge is the democratic character of Israel. We've seen legislation in the last couple of years that, from our perspective, is harming minorities. We would like to see a democratic Israel with pluralism and lots of views, and in the past couple of years, it seems the majority is not respecting minorities enough.

Sharon Abraham-Weiss

> We would like to see a democratic Israel with pluralism and lots of views, and in the past couple of years, it seems the majority is not respecting minorities enough.

In terms of social rights, we do see a bigger gap among different layers of Israeli society. Economically, more people are in poverty. Israel started as a social state. It was established under a European model, and slowly, slowly, with privatization, it moved toward the North American model. I think fewer and fewer people are living in dignity. It is something that bothers us, and we are dealing with this as well.

Can you talk about how ACRI tackles the threat to free speech and expression in Israel?

When talking about the democratic character of Israel, freedom of speech is one example. There were a couple recent pieces of legislation and policies that seem to abuse minorities and aren't good for the public sphere, and we saw the Ministry of Culture trying to interfere with the criteria of support for films for festivals, for books and other things, and whenever the views represent minorities, it seems to be restricted in many ways. This is something we definitely see in Israel.

There is also what is known as the anti-NGO bill, which is trying to limit the activities of non-governmental organizations, and I think that in a democratic country, you want to have a flourishing civil society and not limit civil society. There is a suggestion to "mark" some NGOs as foreign entities. The moment you call something a foreign entity, it has a smell of treason, or something bad. It's like the McCarthy era in the United States, when people held views that were not respected by the majority, and they were marginalized.

What are your ambitions as the leader of ACRI?

I've worked my whole professional life to make a better Israel. And to me, a better Israel is democratic with equality for all its citizens. Obviously, the occupation is a violation of the human rights of millions of people.

When I look around, I think we can do better. I think in many ways, we talk about a start-up nation – there are wonderful things that are happening, but on the other hand, I think these things can't cover up the things we are not doing well enough and that we should do better. I think the way we treat the Arab minority and the way we treat people who are living in poverty is not good enough. This is the job of a human rights organization – to give voice to the disenfranchised.

I'll give you an example. In 1994, we represented Alice Miller, who wanted to be a pilot in the IDF. When we represented her, everyone was against it, saying how could we go against the IDF, and it's terrible. We won that case. This year, Alice Miller was the torchbearer at a national ceremony on Independence Day. If you're asking me about my role and what it is supposed to be, it is exactly that – advocating for women's rights and equality.

We have to identify what is today on the margins and to bring it to the heart of the consensus, and today when we represent minorities, refugees, Arab-Israelis and other people who are suffering from violations of human rights, we want to bring it to the heart of the consensus, so that people will understand that they deserve rights, exactly as we did with women's rights and equality.

In all your time with ACRI, have you seen much progress in Israeli society?

With women and minorities, we've seen some progress. I think the term "dignified existence" is a term that is common in the public sphere today. On the other hand, when I look at the rights of Palestinians, I think there is no progress there.

What is your goal for your visit to Canada?

I think a lot of people are interested in Israel as a democracy. When you say Israel, people think only about the conflict. We live here as people – we go to the grocery store, we have to pay our bills, we have minorities, we have constitutional law – so I'm trying to give an inside view about life in Israel and what it means. ■

Stalin and Hitler at the movies

Backstory

EROL ARAF

Hitler adored Mickey Mouse movies. For his birthday in 1937, Joseph Goebbels gave Hitler 12 Mickey Mouse films, including Mickey's Fire Brigade and Mickey's Polo Team. "He is extremely pleased," the minister of propaganda wrote in his diary, "for this treasure that will hopefully bring him much joy and relaxation." And meanwhile, as the Fuehrer was roaring with laughter at Mickey's antics in his Berchsgaden lair, Stalin was clapping his knees with delight as he watched Charlie Chaplin films in his dacha.

The two tyrants, who turned Eurasia into blood-soaked weeping meadows, had a great deal in common. Lord Alan Bullock, in his magisterial Hitler and Stalin Parallel Lives, draws attention to their narcissism. But it was in their infatuation with moving pictures as tools of propaganda and self-aggrandizement that their narcissism converged perfectly.

Epic historical dramas on the silver screen exacerbated their larger than life self images as they transported themselves into the visual narrative medium, where superheroes changed the course of the world by performing impossible feats. They identified with their respective national icons depicted in historical films and conflated their destinies with the fates of mist-shrouded warrior knights whose epoch-making accomplishments were melodramatically magnified on the silver screen.

Seeing themselves as supreme actors on the global stage, both overlords stepped out of the darkened theatre and tried to mould the world in their own images with blood, iron and swords. Their enraptured "audiences" responded by adorning them with garlands and losing themselves in orgies of adulation. Hitler saw himself as anointed by Providence to save the German race while Stalin regarded himself as the ultimate personified manifestation of Dialectical Materialism ineluctably paving the way for the establishment of the first communist state in history.

One imagined that he was transfigured into a latter day Frederic the Great, the other reconfigured himself as a risen Ivan the Terrible.

As depicted in Andrei Konchalovsky's film The Inner Circle, Stalin was a movie buff. He fervently believed in Lenin's dictum that "Of all the arts, cinema for us is the most important." Under Stalin, the Communist Party aimed at transforming the Soviet Union not only economically but also culturally under the aegis of a centrally planned cultural dictatorship where each image was scrutinized for its total conformity with socialist realism. Marx had once observed that revolution first started in the consciousness of the masses; Stalin was now determined to cement it with celluloid images engraved in the minds of the proletariat.

While Stalinism viewed Hollywood as the opium of the soul, it nevertheless saw a great deal of merit in films like Thief of Baghdad, Tarzan, James Cagney's gangster thrillers, romantic musicals like the Great Waltz and John Ford movies. Like Hitler, Stalin supervised each Soviet film in minute detail: he, very much like his ultimate nemesis in Berlin, was at once censor, director, editor and, script writer. Stalin, in the same manner as Hitler, "suggested" films, chose subjects, selected the music, picked directors, intertwined actors, watched rough cuts, inserted and deleted whole scenes, ordered remakes and made or broke film directors, often killing those who deviated from the politically correct artistic "ism."

In both cases, dictatorship begat a visual world which made mass murder both desirable and necessary. If the projected imagery of the Jew and the kulak is one of sewer rats scurrying like demented feral carriers of the Black Death or bats embedded in the flesh of the innocent, what could be more salutary for public hygiene than their total elimination? Demonization preceded the incandescent chimneys of Auschwitz and the frozen mass burial grounds of the Gulag.

But it fell to one of Hitler's first Jewish intellectual victims, Walter Benjamin, to discern a crucial difference between the two dictators' approaches to cinematography. In The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction, Benjamin writes: "Mankind, which in Homer's time was an object of contemplation for the Olympian gods, now is one for itself. Its self-alienation has reached such a degree that it can experience its own destruction as an esthetic pleasure of the first order. This is the situation of politics which fascism is rendering esthetic. Communism responds by politicizing art."

Benjamin committed suicide rather than live to witness the fulfilment of his prophecy. ■

Shochet-assisted suicide solution, and a belated conversion for Purim

A sacrifice for the greater good?

A group of chickens in eastern Ontario wants to help solve the lack of locally produced kosher poultry by committing shochet-assisted suicide en masse this month. The fowl have already secured the services of Toronto shochet Farnie Berber, but the process is being held up by the Chicken Farmers of Ontario, a spokesbird clucked. The CFO controls the process of picking a kosher chicken supplier, but it's said to favour bidders linked to the Kashruth Council of Belleville, while Berber works for the Newfoundland Kosher certification agency. Berber's methods are decidedly un-Orthodox: the chickens plan to kill themselves March 25 by drinking his cyanide-laced sugarless Kool-Aid.

Finally, he's a Jew

JoJo McSergee, The CJN's longtime managing editor, recently outed as a Catholic by CIJNews, says he's converting to Judaism. "It's about time," said McSergee, who's been with the paper "for several decades." He made the decision after attending a recent Shabbaton. "I was a bit farshikert when an Orthodox hipster, of sorts, with a bright orange beanie started passing some gefilte fish around and offered me some." McSergee has immersed himself in Jewish culture, viewing both Fiddler on the Roof and Yentl 20 times. "That Barbara Streisand, oy, what a shiny maiden." McSergee has also purchased a retirement residence in Florida and says he'll "cheer for the Jewish team at the next Maccabiah Games." His favourite part of Judaism? Chinese food on Christmas.

Don't do it! Choose life!

Even Jerry Springer is appalled

Jerry Springer says the behaviour of Republican U.S. presidential candidates reminds him of his boisterous talk show. "Watching the Republican debates, I said if they're going to start doing my show, they should start paying me," Springer told MSNBC. "It's one thing to have a television show like that, but that's not how you run a country, and it's disgraceful." Springer, 72, a Democratic former mayor of Cincinnati, said a Donald Trump presidency would ruin America's image. ■

Expand genetic testing

As the parent of two daughters with Usher Syndrome Type 1F, an Ashkenazi Jewish genetic disease that is carried by approximately two per cent of all Ashkenazi Jews, I am concerned that you omitted mention of this disease ("Why genetic testing matters," March 17).

Usher Syndrome is the leading cause of deaf-blindness, and Usher 1F is the leading cause of deaf-blindness among those who are Jewish. Babies with Usher 1F are born profoundly deaf with impaired balance. During childhood, they begin to lose their vision due to retinitis pigmentosa, first with night blindness followed by loss of peripheral vision with a visual field that continues to narrow until total blindness results during adulthood.

While your article cites progress in Canada since seven Jewish genetic diseases are now part of the standard testing panel, Canada still lags far behind the United States, where 19 diseases are routinely tested for, with testing for an additional 38 diseases also available.

Because it is now possible for young Jewish couples to take steps to avoid having children with these devastating diseases, this is information that should be available to all. Canada needs to step up and improve its testing.

We have a Judaica gallery

With respect to Evelyn Tauben's article "What we must rebuild before building a Jewish museum" (Feb. 25), I would like to draw your readers' attention to the presence of a Judaica gallery in Toronto that was not mentioned in the article.

The Dr. Fred Weinberg and Joy Cherry Weinberg Judaica Gallery opened in September 2000 within the prestigious Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) in Toronto.

My parents, Joy Cherry Weinberg and the late Dr. Fred Weinberg, lifetime collectors, made the deliberate decision to donate their personal European Judaica collection to the ROM, so that visitors of all faiths and backgrounds would have the opportunity to better understand the history of the Jewish People and that this history could be understood in the historical, cultural and artistic context of world culture and history.

In creating the Judaica gallery within the ROM, my parents were the "risk takers, galvanizing leaders, philanthropists and experienced cultural professionals" that Tauben cited as missing from our community.

I recognize Tauben's call for a national, self-standing Canadian Jewish museum. However, we would be remiss to disregard the foundations that are already in place. I welcome the opportunity to have your readers visit the Judaica gallery at the ROM, where they will find a beautiful collection, exquisitely explained and displayed, right here in our own Canadian backyard.

Hateful speech on campus

I'm a first-year Jewish student at the University of Toronto and a member of Israel on Campus. As part of monitoring this year's Israeli Apartheid Week, I attended two events.

One speaker at the first event accused "Zios" of controlling Brooklyn's housing market and denying housing to non-Jews. Most disgustingly of all, she referred to a group of Orthodox Jews she was travelling with as "Ashke-nazis." There is no doubt that this was intentional and particularly abhorrent. She was applauded by the entire room, including the organizers of the event, at the end of her speech.

At the end of the second event, a questioner asked how "to defeat the Zionist-Jewish conspiracy that controls all the banks and mainstream media." The speaker was thanked for his question and not censured in any way, again making it difficult to understand how university policies on racial harassment were being upheld at this event.

As galling as these statements may be, what is equally frustrating to me is the administration's indifference. Since sending a letter to the university several days ago, I have not received a response. It is disheartening that a university with a duty to protect all its students equally would so blatantly ignore any situation in which Jews are the victims.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Purim is our great release

The holiday gives us a chance to laugh in the face of life's struggles, and to cross over from the certainties we know to the possibilities that could exist

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: Yiddish wisdom teaches, "Neither cursing nor laughing can change the world."

I'm not so sure. Purim is a great release. We let off a little steam at Haman's expense and we laugh in the face of life's struggles.

Curses, laughter and a little schnapps can be strong medicine – at least for one night.

Rabbi Fishman: Oy vey! Yiddish curses. They somehow manage to give you a blessing at the same time as trying to cause you harm. Take for instance: "He should have a large store, and whatever people ask for, he shouldn't have, and what he does have shouldn't be requested."

If all we have to help us deal with our enemies or troubles is a cheeky quip, the chance to laugh, or a Yiddish curse, it's enough. And what better expression of laughter that overcomes evil than the holiday of Purim?

Rabbi Splansky: When Jews were powerless over the ruthless rulers of their own time, they allowed themselves one day a year to take revenge against a prop of a villain from a world of long ago and far away.

One Purim, I made a Haman effigy out of a broomstick. Instead of fire or stones, we lobbed Yiddish curses at him, including: "May you have a hundred houses, in each house a hundred rooms, in each room 20 beds. And may fever and chills and delirium drive you from bed to bed throughout the night."

And "May you enjoy a good time with plenty to drink, so your blood turns to whiskey and 100 bedbugs get drunk on it and dance the mazurka in your belly button."

Or, "May you be so enamoured of good food that you turn into a blintz, and may your enemy turn into a cat, and may he eat you up and choke on you, so we can be rid of you both."

Rabbi Fishman: The story of Purim is one of reversals. Such reversals can show us that fate can be blind, and yet, at times, it can work in our favour. The only response to such mazel is to laugh.

At Purim, our laughter is a sign of transcendence. At the end of Chapter 31 of the Book of Proverbs, we are taught about the Eshet Chayil: "She shall laugh on the last day." When everything is said and done, when we come to the end of the process and we can see everything that led up to the final crescendo – then we will laugh the laughter of true joy.

In the meantime, Purim gives us many reasons to rejoice and to celebrate while still being very much in this world. With food and drink – a "mishteh" – I'm reminded of another Yiddish saying: "At other people's parties one eats heartily."

Rabbi Splansky: L'havdil.

On a very different note, I wish to sincerely thank you, Rabbi Fishman, for travelling from Montreal to be with me and my congregation earlier this month. After two years of exchanging ideas in writing, it was a blessing to finally meet you in person and to be able to speak without the restriction of a word count.

May your Purim be filled with joyful surprises and just one moment when laughter brings tears. That's how a Jew celebrates Purim.

Rabbi Fishman: I once celebrated Purim with a mystic from Jerusalem. He was known as a great Kabbalist, and many people flocked to him for advice and to hear his words of Torah. By the end of the Purim meal, everyone around the table was sure that he had revealed the date of the Messiah's arrival. The next day, he denied the entire matter, and we were left wondering what was real and what we had imagined. I think that's the spirit of Purim – to cross over from the certainties we know to the possibilities that could exist.

I departed Toronto and your congregation with a deep appreciation for your hospitality, a new understanding of just how valuable this column is, and the sense of how one is able to turn strangers into friends.

"Let them observe these days of feasting and gladness, for sending delicacies to one another, and giving gifts to the poor" (Esther 9:22). This Purim may we merit stepping out of our certainties and entering into the realm of possibilities. ■

Be part of a vital Community Conversation

Over the past 18 months, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto held an essential dialogue with over 2,000 community members about how our organization could best strengthen Jewish Toronto as we approach this, our Centennial year. With the information we garnered from these conversations, we have completed our Strategic Plan, a plan that many of you helped create. On April 12 at 7 pm at the Lipa Green Centre, we invite you be part of the next step; a Community Conversation about realizing the priorities of the plan we created together.

We cannot thank you enough for your input into our Strategic Plan; we simply couldn't have done it without you. Now, together, let's move to the next stage, a stage that will bring our community together under one roof to find solutions for our collective future.

When registering, attendees will have the opportunity to select two of 5 community priorities outlined in the Strategic Plan and participate in an interactive session exploring those priorities in a comprehensive and hands-on method.

SeeJN | Did you hear the one about the bear?

Back in the days of Soviet Russia, a young Jewish man could only find a job with a travelling circus. He was hired to put on a bear costume and perform various animal tricks. The circus-goers were none the wiser and everyone was happy. One day he found himself left alone with the circus' lion. His worst nightmare was realized. For sure he, as a bear, would be eaten by the lion. But as he braced himself for the inevitable attack, he suddenly heard the lion respond: "Baruch shem kvod malchuto le'olam va'ed." ("Blessed is his Kingdom forever and ever.") "You know Hebrew!" gasped the "bear." "Hey," exclaimed the "lion," "do you think you're the only Yid in Russia who couldn't get a proper job?"

Breaking down the action at Meshugene March

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, and welcome back to The CJN's exclusive ongoing coverage of Meshugene March, the annual winner-take-all tournament that brings together the biggest and brightest names in Canadian Jewry along with a host of upstarts looking to make their marks. If you're just tuning in, let's bring you up to date on some of the action thus far in our four divisions:

Jewish Organizations: As expected, the Orgs bracket has seen some of the closest competition, with groups from across the country facing off to see who will represent the Jewish community in the Final Fir. Two perennial powerhouses are set to collide next, when the Jewish National Fund (JNF) takes on Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center. The bookies appear to favour the Friends, who have stymied opponents so far with their patented full-court press, while JNF will have to travel cross-country to Vancouver for the game and could be a little discombobulated by their surroundings. Earlier, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs earned a bye after scheduled opponent Independent Jewish Voices opted to hold its own tournament across town instead, setting CIJA up against the Federation All-stars. The winner of that matchup could be the favourite to take home all the gelt.

Political Parties: Meanwhile, in the Politics division, things have gone according to plan thus far, with the Liberals manhandling the NDP, which was playing without team leader Thomas Mulcair (who said he would be there, but didn't show up), and the Conservatives winning by forfeit after the Greens failed to muster enough players. That sets up an expected Liberal-Conservative clash that pundits have been drooling over. The last time these two teams met, the Reds won handily. Now, the Blues are out for revenge. Expect a raucous crowd for this one!

Jewish Communities: Meshugene March is perhaps best known for upsets – when powerhouse teams fall prey to lesser-known underdogs – and that has certainly been the case in the Cities bracket. Toronto and Montreal both cruised to wins in the early rounds, before coming up against Winnipeg and Halifax, respectively. Both games were tight until the very end, but the dark horses ultimately prevailed, leaving Toronto head coach Drake and Montreal manager Irwin Cotler to admit their teams were clearly looking ahead to another marquee showdown instead of focusing on the opponents at hand. A source with access to the Montreal and Toronto dressing rooms concurred, adding both teams were so confident going into their matches that neither had even reviewed tape of their opponents.

Righteous Gentiles: Heading into the round of 16 – a.k.a., the Zis Zektsyn – there was some unexpected controversy, after officials had difficulty determining how exactly to define a gentile. Some referees claimed matrilineal descent was the only acceptable way to decide who was, and who was not, a non-Jew, while other voices questioned whether the time had arrived to loosen those rules. Tournament officials are still reviewing the matter, and a decision is expected soon.

Stay with The CJN for complete coverage of Meshugene March. And head over to cjnews.com, where you can fill out your own bracket and play along at home.

Happy Purim! ■ — YONI

HUMOUR

Your indispensably honest guide to attending a bar/bat mitzvah

Michael Wolfe

Be forewarned: if you have 12-and/or 13-year-old kids, you are about to enter a Twilight Zone-esque parallel universe known as "The Bar/Bat Mitzvah Circuit." This will require not only a complete commitment of your free time, energy and financial resources, but also a twisted understanding of human nature. So, before you or your children step toward the synagogue doors, I've assembled the definitive rookie's guide to attending a bar or bat mitzvah party.

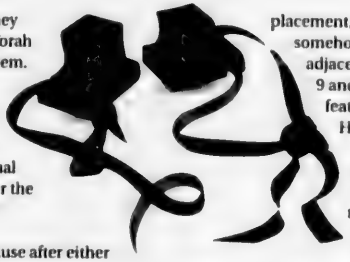
The Invitation: Several weeks before the event, an invitation on paper stock roughly as thick as a strip steak will arrive at your home. The amount of enjoyment you will experience at the event is inversely proportional to the amount of glitter that falls out of the envelope.

The Service: You will notice that for the first half of the service, the child being bar/bat mitzvahed is not doing anything besides sitting on the bimah in an oversized chair looking vaguely uncomfortable. This is so that the family can conduct last-minute mobile stock liquidations to help pay for everything that follows.

• Eventually, the young man or woman will take centre stage for some preliminary prayers in Hebrew and English. It is likely that they will hit puberty during the third or fourth verse of the second prayer.

• When it is time to read directly from the Torah, a succession of family members will take the stage to recite blessings. Inevitably, Uncle Herb will butcher the blessing despite hearing it thousands of times. Aunt Nancy will elbow him in the ribs. The rabbi will smile and silently wonder why he chose his given profession.

• After the Torah reading, the boy or girl will read an essay they wrote on what the Torah portion means to them. This despite the fact that the literal reading of most Torah portions involves either the ritual slaughter of a goat or the subtle endorsement of polygamy.



• There is no applause after either the Torah or Haftorah reading, in order to allow sleeping congregants to continue their slumber.

The Gift: Because Jews love to contradict stereotypes, the only acceptable gift is cold hard cash. Cheques are fine, too. All gifts must be given in increments of $18.

• If you give more than the amount given to your own child at his or her bar/bat mitzvah, you will be considered a snob. If you give less, a special investigation will be launched at the next Hadassah board meeting. It's best just to make things match.

The Party, Hour One – Cocktails: You will be offered a stuffed mushroom or a piece of meat on a stick at least once every 14.3 seconds. No matter how elegant the appetizers, nothing will be more fought over than a tray of mini hot dogs wrapped in puffed pastry.

• If you are male, within 10 minutes of entering the event you will spill some kind of red sauce on your white dress shirt. You will attempt to cover this up and hope your wife is too distracted by the action at the sushi table to notice.

The Party, Hour Two – Enter The Hall: It will take you 15 minutes to find your place at Table 14, because Jews have a sense of humour about non-linear table placement, and Table 14 will somehow be located in a row adjacent to Table 3, Table 9 and a numberless table featuring a picture of Harry Styles.

• The bar or bat mitzvah child will be carried into the room like the pope. They will be mildly upstaged by their younger brother or sister, who will be wearing adorable sunglasses and a fedora.

• You will be grabbed by the sweaty right hand of Uncle Irwin, who will pull you into the hora. You will grab the non-sweaty left hand of a random female guest, who will look mildly disgusted by your sweaty right hand.

• A chair will be brought to the centre of the circle. Do not sit in this chair. It is reserved to individually raise each family member in a Lion King-like salute to their power and authority over you.

The Party, Hour Three – The Meal: You will only be given one bread roll. Eat it quickly, or guard it like the Hope Diamond.

• During the salad course, the father of the honoured child will take to the stage to give a toast. He will thank everyone for coming, "from near and far." He will also thank his lovely and beautiful wife for putting so much time and effort into such an incredible event. Try to catch a glimpse in the background of the exhausted party planner getting intravenous fluids.

• The husband will also salute the amazing job his child did at that day's ceremony. Note that his speech was written at least 72 hours before the event, having no idea whether his child excelled or butchered the Torah portion. Shake off the hypocrisy and clap politely. He's paying for your drinks.

The Party, Hour Four – Your Time to Shine: As you manage to eat your last bite of salmon, a table with candles may be wheeled out onto the dance floor. Key individuals in attendance will be asked to join the child on stage while lighting a candle in their honour.

• Once complete, the table and its now-burning tablecloth will be wheeled off the stage and the DJ will play a song by Michael Jackson, a formal signal that marks the beginning of the "old people" portion of the dance festivities.

• For the next 20 minutes only, the DJ will dust off songs created between 1970 and 1990, while the adults pretend they are still culturally relevant. You will dance enthusiastically and think you look good doing it.

• You will not look good.

The Exit: You can't leave yet. Give it at least another 20 minutes before you offer up a strategic yawn and put yourself into the now-40-people-deep farewell line.

• Jews don't let Jews drive hungry. You will find to-go bags filled with donuts, warm pretzels and bottled water with monogrammed labels as you approach the exit. You will eat the entire contents while waiting in the coat check line.

• There will also be a gigantic row of candy in jars. Several moms will nonchalantly fill a bag or two with Skittles and jelly beans, "for their children at home." None of that candy will make it home uneaten.

• You will ultimately arrive home, full and exhausted. But before you collapse into sleep, admit it: you actually enjoyed yourself.

• Rinse and repeat. You've likely got another bar/bat mitzvah next weekend. ■

Community-wide event takes an odd turn

Jewish groups from across the spectrum come together in a display of unity, only to realize they can't seem to agree on all that much

JONNIE B. GOOD HALEVI
NOT VERY SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Canada's mainstream Jewish advocacy groups came together last week for an event celebrating diversity in the Jewish community.

The guest of honour at the pre-Purim celebration – held in a tent in the open field where Toronto's late, lamented Bathurst Jewish Community Centre used to stand – was Stephen Harper. It was the former Conservative prime minister's first public appearance since a sighting at Tim Hortons in suburban Calgary, where he reportedly held up a long line with a speech pledging to stand with Israel through fire and water.

But while Harper was ostensibly the man of the hour, the current prime minister, Justin Trudeau, did not receive such a warm welcome.

"The long, intimate hug that Trudeau shared with U.S. President Barack Obama on his recent state visit to Washington, D.C., is proof that Trudeau is a danger, like Haman," said Ravi Benhihi, president of the recently renamed Friends of the Hollywood Center for Holocaust Research and Education.

"The holiday of Purim teaches us that we need to be on the lookout for enemies of the Jewish People at all times, and this latest act strongly suggests that Trudeau is a character straight out of the Megillah."

He added: "As Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu explained, very indirectly, in his 2015 speech to the U.S. Congress, Barack Obama is an enemy of Israel, and therefore of the Jewish People.

"So the fact Trudeau pals around with him is prima facie evidence of the prime minister's evil nature."

"I hope that logic isn't too hard to follow," he added.

Mere minutes after Benhihi's remarks to reporters, Jonathan Lessthan, former CEO of the Sons of the Covenant Canada, which declared bankruptcy the day before the event, went one step further in smearing Trudeau.

"Justin Trudeau is the reincarnation of Haman, only with much better hair," Lessthan said in a statement sent out from his organization's last remaining computer, a 2003 Compaq Presario laptop.

York passes new BDS motion, with a twist

SHANA MAIDEL
CAMPUS REPORTER

Once again, students at York University have voted on a BDS motion, but this time, BDS stands for "books, dues and students," the slogan for a newly elected slate of student politicians.

"It seemed like a radical idea," said student president-elect Joe White. "We decided to look at the concerns of students and the things we know best, instead of worrying about foreign policy."

The new student government will focus on students' academic concerns and quality-of-life issues at the university's Keele campus in Toronto's northwest suburbs, White said.

Students were evidently impressed by the startling change in tone from previous student governments that had focused exclusively on passing annual divestment motions, and gave the new slate a resounding majority.

"I just think that, like, a student government should, like, worry about students and stuff," said one voter leaving a polling station on campus.

Among the new government's concerns are the high cost of education, the high cost of books and the university's efforts to recruit students who intend to go to class occasionally.

University president Mamdouh Shoukri was unavailable for comment, but the administration issued a tersely worded statement.

"Because the election voting booths were in the student centre, which is not under our jurisdiction, we cannot comment on the results. In fact, the actions of the student government have nothing to do with the university. For that matter, nothing the students do ever has anything to do with York. We can say that the students here do not represent York University."

The newly elected student government will continue to have some jobs for the social justice warriors on campus, White said.

It's time to widen the debate on Israel and Palestine

Mira Sucharov

Does the Canadian Jewish conversation on Israel need broadening, and what would it take to see us broaden our public debate platform to include those voices most critical of Israel?

Recently, American commentator Peter Beinart has urged the Jewish establishment to take seriously the perspective of those who oppose Zionism on intellectual and philosophical grounds. Simone Zimmerman has called on these same Jewish leaders to listen to "millennials' deep outrage at the grave injustices committed by the Jewish state." And then there was the founding of Open Hillel (on whose academic council I sit), which calls on Hillel International to relax its standards of partnership to include a broader discussion of human rights and international law in the context of Israel and Palestine – namely, to include debate around boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS). (The BDS movement promotes three main goals: ending the occupation, instilling equality among Israeli citizens, and allowing refugee return.)

It's no surprise that the mainstream Jewish community embraces Zionism as a touchstone of Jewish communal identity and, therefore, militantly opposes BDS. In addition to being uncomfortable with the basic idea of boycotting Israel, most in the Jewish community realize that at least one of BDS's demands – that of full refugee return – would directly challenge one of Zionism's core aims, namely to maintain a Jewish-majority state.

I have gone on record many times opposing the end game of BDS, which I don't think sufficiently accounts for the needs and identities of both sides. But these debates over Israel, Zionism and the future of the land between the Mediterranean and the Jordan are happening, and there's every sign that they will intensify. And neither can the violence, fear and suffering simply be wished away. BDS offers one set of tactics accompanied by a particular set of goals. If these tactics or goals are deemed unsuitable, what are others offering in return to address the wide-scale human rights violations and seemingly endless occupation?

When it comes to BDS, these conversations can continue to happen in quiet corners – like debates and panels on BDS in which I've participated (one, in Ottawa, that my synagogue refused to allow to be advertised and another, in Vancouver, which did gather some press in the Jewish Independent) – or on social media, where I am currently hosting a focused, multi-part exchange on my public Facebook page between two individuals in Ottawa: David Roytenberg, an active Jewish community member, and Peter Larson, chair of "Canada Talks Israel-Palestine."

That debate began with the guiding question of whether BDS is or is not anti-Semitic, but quickly expanded to include incisive exchanges around whether settlements are an obstacle to peace; whether the separation barrier is an act of self-defence or motivated by a desire to hem in Palestinians, what has historically motivated Palestinian violence; whether the 1967 war was a defensive one; whether Jews have a right to live across the Green Line;and whether the demand for Israel to withdraw is a fair one.

When political discourse occurs in silos, attitudes tend to harden. Talking across the divide – however painful it might be – forces everyone to examine their deeply held assumptions and beliefs. It soon becomes clear which beliefs are worth holding onto and which ones should be updated or discarded. And if the chief debaters may not as easily do this themselves, at least those listening in can.

Wrestling with challenging ideas – including uncomfortable truths about Israel's founding, identifying the most legitimate tactics of dissent, issues around ethnic privilege, nationalism, competing narratives, and the needs and rights of all – is not an easy task. There might be some costs along the way – identities might be shaken, the veneer of community agreement may be eroded, those donors who prefer an echo-chamber model of community discourse might express displeasure or worse – but our community will ultimately be stronger for having let in more light. ■

The facts about Israel that BDSers don't want you to know

Mordechai Ben-Dat

What is so galling about the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement that targets Israel and its supporters is its utterly false and fraudulent foundation.

It is patently untrue that Israel is an apartheid state. Yet by brandishing that loaded term, the originators of the BDS movement – among them the clever Omar Barghouti – knew they would attract many idealistic youths to their cause.

Barghouti and his confederates claim Israel is an apartheid state because it occupies Palestine. The fact he has only ever defined this "occupation" in terms of all of pre-1948 Mandatory Palestine has never bothered the idealistic young people who shout his hateful, vile slogans at countless college rallies around the western world. Nor do his ardent champions seem to acknowledge, let alone care, that the BDS founders are opposed to two states – Israel and Palestine – living side by side. Barghouti does not believe the Jews are entitled to their own sovereign existence in the Middle East.

And yet, students and professors in North America and Europe flock to Barghouti's extreme, anti-Israel mission like ravenous cicadas swarming a fruit tree.

This, of course, is the source of great pique and piercing sadness. We know the BDS movement exploits many well-meaning, if not always well-informed, students. Of course, there are true haters of Israel and disparagers of Jews who populate the BDS movement. But they are not our concern.

Our concern is for the gullible and the easily deceived who wish, as caring individuals, to stand for justice, integrity and the sanctity of life. They are rightly opposed to actual "apartheid." But they know so little about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians that they're unable to resist the social and other pressures that sweep them up in the zealotry of their good intentions.

So, we bring two recent stories that depict a different, more factual image of Israel.

• Earlier this month, Israel announced it's donating a water purification system, the GalMobile, to drought-stricken Papua New Guinea. Approximately 85 per cent of the country's six million people lack access to electricity and tap water. The vehicle is a mobile potable water-treatment, storage and distribution system that connects to any possible water source and produces safe drinking water at World Health Organization standards in less than 30 minutes, yielding approximately 8,000 cups of water per hour.

The Caesarea-based G.A.L. Water Technologies and Israel's Foreign Ministry have been providing water-treatment systems to countries in Africa for more than 20 years.

• Last month, Israel embarked on a bold agricultural aid program in Senegal – a mostly Muslim country – to help change the future of the arid, food-starved nation of some 14 million people. The project was conceived years ago and is known by the acronym TIPA (Technology, Innovation and Poverty Alleviation). Israel is partnering with local universities to provide training in rural agriculture technologies, specifically the drip irrigation system it invented. Drip irrigation tubes line the landscape, where small farms – each of about 1,000 square metres – are being built under Israeli-Italian-Senegalese auspices. In all, Israel plans to help create and assist 4,000 small family farms to produce their own crops.

Former prime minister Aminata Toure, who advises Senegal's president, praised Israel's approach to aiding her country. "We would like to strengthen the agricultural connection with Israel," she said, while Agriculture Minister Papa Abdoulaye Seck added: "[Israel] is in a difficult environment, but [it makes] the difference due to knowledge, technology and willingness to transform the environment." Toure noted that more than 600 Senegalese have been trained in Israel in agriculture and other fields.

This is the news that BDS champions crave to suppress. It tells the deeper truth about the Jewish state. But truth is not in the BDSers' interest. The proponents of BDS avoid the truth, because they know that if discovered, it might inspire a genuine curiosity about Israel among some BDS champions, who might then understand they've been exploited all along. ■

Another reason to celebrate on Purim

Rabbi Jay Kelman, CPA, CA

These words are being published on Purim, the most joyous day of year, when we celebrate the survival and strength of the Jewish People in the face of our many enemies.

But there is another subtler, yet perhaps more important, reason for celebrating. Purim is the transitional point of Jewish history, where we move from a religion led by prophets to one led by sages. No longer did the Jewish People (and the world at large) have direct access to the word of God. We would henceforth need to debate and determine the best way to fulfil our Divine mission on earth.

This is not dissimilar from a child who in his early years is guided by his parents, with the challenge being whether to heed their advice. At some point, the child leaves home, the parents are no longer and the now-grown child must make adult decisions on his own. For their first 1,000 years or so, the Jewish People received clear instructions on what to do, though we had a hard time following them. As our first exile was ending and we were returning to Zion, prophecy was winding down.

The name Esther means hidden, as we entered the historical stage when God is hidden from us. It's not by chance that God's name does not appear in the Megillah. Without prophetic help, Esther and Mordechai argue as to the proper reaction to Haman's decree – a debate that continues to this day.

Our sages declare that a wise person is greater than a prophet. We must use our own efforts and abilities to figure out how to act. Relying on others – even a prophet – is an abdication of responsibility. With that responsibility comes uncertainty, as despite our best efforts, we can't always make decisions today that will, in hindsight, be the right ones 10, 100 or 1,000 years from now. All we can do is try our best – no simple task – and hope and pray for the best.

This transition from prophets to sages, from clarity to uncertainty, is worth celebrating. While the financial markets abhor uncertainty, our moral development requires it. The more we control the future, the less we need to concern ourselves with the present. The Torah notes that God chose the Land of Israel for the Jewish People because, unlike Egypt, it was dependent on rainwater for survival. Rainwater fluctuates from year to year, leaving us to work hard morally in order to receive God's blessing, and intellectually so as to develop technologies to help bring more systematic order. While these two ideas may contradict each other – do we or don't we want a stable water system? – such is the nature of man's partnership with God. We must realize we are dependent on Him, even as we explore ways to have greater independence.

It's for this reason that many parents of means are hesitant to just give their children oodles of money. It's not healthy to be granted financial independence without having to work for it. Some commentaries actually explain that this is the reason for the (theoretical) prohibition on interest. Being able to sit back and collect income without work was seen as potentially harmful.

This tension is seen in the teaching that we "may not rely on miracles." We may pray to God and believe that God's hand is never far away, yet we must never rely on God. As heretical as it sounds, we must live our lives as if God remains aloof from this world.

Our Sages teach that "poverty is a wheel that returns to all," and that's not a bad thing. There are challenges of poverty, but the wealthy face equal and perhaps greater challenges. Purim is the time of sending portions one to another and gifts to the poor. It is this joining together of all as one that's most worthy of celebration. ■

Never give up on life

Norma Baumel Joseph

In December 2015, Quebec legalized "medical aid in dying." Although still contentious, especially in the medical and legal communities, the law specifies that the person involved be an adult, have some kind of incurable disease and be in constant and unbearable physical or psychological pain.

The word used, "euthanasia," literally means a "good death." It refers to the intentional and purposeful taking of a human life. Euthanasia denotes explicitly ending another person's life. Assisted suicide signifies giving someone the information or tools to end his or her own life.

The development of the rather extensive ethical, medical and legal literature focuses on both categories, in terms of ways of assenting to or assisting in some form of suicide, of aiding and abetting the decision to end a life. Whether it's passive or active, physician-aided or personally undertaken, all the debates acknowledge that there are extraordinary cases of human suffering that cry out for our ethical consideration and for practical resolutions.

While I know that I cannot imagine the condition of some people's lives, their pain and suffering, I must admit to great concerns about our current solutions.

I worry about our society's moral values and sacred commitment to life. I worry about the facility with which we deliberate about choice in death. I worry that we have ignored our religious principles. Perhaps we should be concentrating on hospice and palliative care.

Choosing to die or end a life, after all, is very final. Who chooses and who helps make the choice or perform the act? What pressures exist and who presses?

The ethical slippery slope doesn't just worry me – it terrifies me.

Earlier this month, the Montreal Gazette posted an article about a 92-year-old woman whose life was turned upside down and who will never fully recover. When she courageously escaped into the cold, she told the authorities how three people, not related to her, forcibly removed her from her home and took over her life. They effectively got legal control of her life and her bank accounts. "Out of the blue, she was forced into a residence, a virtual prisoner, with no access to her life savings, branded incapable of functioning on her own."

> The ethical slippery slope doesn't just worry me – it terrifies me.

As the story unfolds, it's clear it was not difficult to gain control of her life. Significantly, this is not an isolated case. Elder abuse is growing and underreported. One in 10 seniors experience some form of elder abuse according to Statistics Canada.

What is wrong with our society? In other cultures, elders were considered the wise ones, effectively a community's library or archive. They were revered and heeded.

Given our cultural mistreatment of the elderly, how easy will it be to convince some seniors that they really want to or need to die? Pressure on them, or outright exploitation, makes end-of-life decisions multifaceted and dangerous.

One more cautionary consideration: at what point is the end-of-life decision made by an individual? When my mother was able, she clearly did not want to suffer or be a burden on the family. She would have signed any end-of-life statement to that effect. But later, even in the actual experience of suffering, her body fought for life. Somehow, she refused to die. No law could be appropriate or ethical that would have allowed us to end her life, no matter what she had signed earlier. We do not know how strong the desire for life is within us. We cannot imagine or really know how we will feel at the end.

Given the ethical complexity and uncertainty, how can we as a society enable or entertain this right to choose death?

Caution is called for – extreme caution. ■

Canada should push for UN reform, Jewish groups say

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Observers in the Jewish community reacted with cautious approval to the announcement that Canada would bid for a two-year term on the UN Security Council in 2021.

"Participation on the Security Council is a practical and symbolic metric of Canada's full engagement in the multilateral efforts of the international system to enhance peace, security and stability on a global level," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

"For the Trudeau government in particular, it would be an important confirmation or validation of Canada playing that kind of role within the international community," Fogel added.

"It will be a long process for Canada to regain its role and reputation for peacekeeping and to take our place on the Security Council, but it is a process well worth beginning," said Karen Mock, a spokesperson for JSpace Canada, a left-wing Zionist organization.

"Canada can and should increase our efforts to contribute meaningfully to UN reform and to helping the UN regain its credibility for human rights, security and peace for all, not just some."

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau made the announcement that Canada would be seeking the Security Council seat during a visit to UN headquarters in New York last week.

"We are determined to help the UN make even greater strides in support of its goals for all humanity," Trudeau said March 16 in the UN building. "My friends, it's time. It's time for Canada to step up once again."

Citing the importance of gender equality, refugee resettlement, respect for diversity, stability in the Middle East and addressing climate change, Trudeau said, "This is the Canada of today."

Later, in an address to the Security Council, Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion said, "We seek a seat at the Security Council precisely because the world finds itself at a time when there is a pressing need to prevent violent extremism, to manage conflict and to respond to humanitarian crises.

"The world needs a more active and more engaged Canada," Dion added.

Canada is vying with Norway and Ireland for the non-permanent seat allocated to western nations.

"Beyond the symbolic aspect of joining the Security Council, Canada could leverage its position and consensus-building skill to help reach agreements on important international issues," Fogel said.

"The real issue surrounding the UN and Canada's contribution to that institution is the extent to which Canada is prepared to speak 'truth to power' about the need for UN reform across the whole system of its agencies and activities," he added. "If Canada truly wants to play a meaningful and constructive role over the coming period, it will focus its energies on reforming those agencies, like the Human Rights Council, rather than the ephemeral attraction of seats on the Security Council."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the organization "supports Canada's bid to sit on the Security Council and offer much needed guidance in support of democratic ideals, freedom and justice around the world. By the same token, we anticipate our Canadian representative will work to counter the growing anti-Semitism at the UN by providing a strong voice in support of Israel, while harshly denouncing brutal dictatorships like Syria and Iran."

Stuart Kamenetsky, a professor of psychology at the University of Toronto and observer of Canada's Middle East policy, said, "If this results in Canada having a voice on the Security Council that will result core values of fairness, decency, fighting against dictators and injustices in the world – great.

"But if Canada, in order to secure this seat, will return to become an 'honest broker', which basically means that it will become like other western countries that are obsessed with criticizing Israel – it's not worth the 'honour' of the seat," he added.

"I hope that Canada doesn't do 'anything' to get the seat. It must stick to important core values or else the seat isn't worth it," Kamenetsky said.

Meanwhile, in an odd twist, the UN first announced that Canada would resume funding for UNRWA, and then retracted the announcement.

UN spokesperson Stéphane Dujarric said the statement was an early draft sent by mistake.

It was issued following a meeting between Trudeau and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon.

UNRWA is a UN agency whose mandate is to provide aid to Palestinian refugees. Critics say it is aligned with Hamas, which Canada has designated as a terrorist organization. Canada stopped funding UNRWA in 2010 under former prime minister Stephen Harper.

But the new Liberal government has suggested it is considering restoring $15 million in funding for the organization.

"We're evaluating the situation. And the decision will be taken shortly," International Co-operation Minister Marie-Claude Bibeau said last month. ■

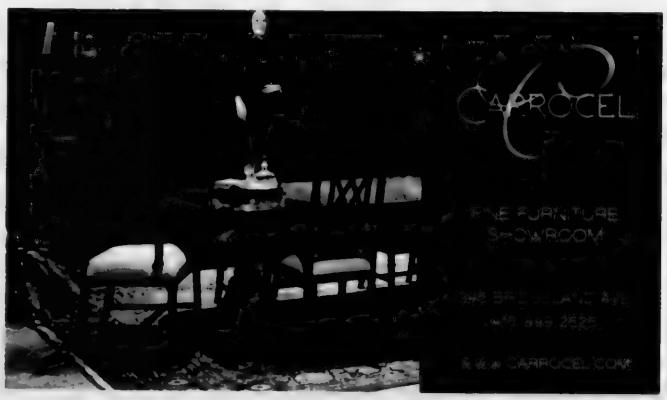
THOMAS (MINUK) ALI



WHY IS IT SUCH A GREAT FESTIVAL?

Dr. M. Laitman
Professor of Ontology

Party Theme

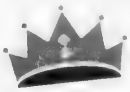
Purim is a great festival: great fear of annihilation, at first, and great joy after the salvation, at last. The celebrations on this festival are exceptionally happy, given the commandment to consume alcohol to the point of inability to tell wicked Haman from righteous Mordechai. But what are we really celebrating on Purim? We celebrate becoming one, the state that all of humanity must achieve. Now back to our story ....

The Symbols and the Costumes

Purim is also a festival of symbolism. The primary message of the festival is that in the face of the purest evil, portrayed by Haman, even the epitome of good, portrayed by Mordechai, is helpless. The only thing that helps against pure evil is unity. When Mordechai pleads with Esther to beg for the king's mercy, she says that even she, the queen, cannot save them unless he, Mordechai, gathers all the Jews and they fast and pray for her. Then, when they are united once again, she endeavors and succeeds. The costumes are another symbolic custom worth noting. Purim is not a Jewish version of Halloween.

The costumes imply concealment of the powers that play out this scenario within each of us.

Plot and Main Characters



In his book, Shamati (I Heard), Rav Yehuda Ashlag, author of the Sulam (Ladder) commentary on The Book of Zohar, explains that the king represents God. Esther, the Jewish queen, represents a corrected desire to connect with God. This is why she appears after Queen Vashti corrupts her ways and the king divorces her. She is called Esther (Ester in Hebrew), from the Hebrew word Hester (concealment), because her Jewish identity is still concealed. It is revealed only when she must act in order to save the Jews, hence the word Megilah (scroll/book), from the Hebrew word Gilui (revealing). This is why the plot described in the book of Esther is considered a "concealed miracle," to denote a miracle of the revelation of God's power in a hidden way.

Mordechai represents the quality of mercy. He is pure kindness and wants nothing for himself. When two servants plot to assassinthe king and Mordechai warns him through Esther, the king does not reward Mordechai, nor does Mordechai request reward or even recognition for it.

Another important element that is concealed in the story is that God's plan is to establish the quality of mercy, portrayed by Mordechai, as the ruler of the kingdom (world). Clearly, if the world is governed by mercy, meaning Mordechai, people will be much happier than if they are governed by wickedness, which Haman portrays. But Mordechai has no desire to govern since he wants nothing for himself.

To compel Mordechai to act so as to finally become the ruler, the king must introduce a threat big enough to prod Mordechai into action, a threat of destruction not just of Mordechai, but of his entire people. This threat is Haman, who represents the opposite of mercy—a ruthless desire to consume, to own, to control, and to indulge oneself without any thought of others. In short,

Haman's argument in favor of killing the Jews is that they are not united: "There is a certain people, scattered and dispersed." The Jews became a nation when they pledged to be united "as one man with one heart." Haman argues that they do not "keep the king's laws," which makes perfect sense considering that the law by which they were established is the law of unity. If they are dispersed, they are not keeping it. In such a state they are redundant, so Haman tells the king he should get rid of them.

The Jews have no idea how to save themselves, nor do they realize what they have done wrong to deserve death. Then Mordechai comes and gathers them in prayer for Esther's success in her litany, and they follow him. By doing so, they reunite and become a nation once again, just as when they became a nation at the foot of Mt. Sinai. This makes Haman's argument invalid, since they are no longer scattered, and are no longer breaking the king's law. Naturally, at that point the verdict is revoked.

The Hidden Meaning

The characters in this play tell us about hidden forces that act within us as individuals, and among us as people. These forces areever present and sustain our spiritual development. As they created Haman in those days, they are creating new Hamans each day.As then, so now, the antidote is unity. If we unite, we are saved. If we forget it, we are threatened, and even destroyed.

The Celebration

This brings us to the great joy of Purim, where we are commanded to drink until we cannot tell the wicked from the righteous. The thing is that when we unite, we spread that unity throughout the kingdom, meaning the whole of creation. By doing so we become "a light unto nations," spreading the light of unity. When all the people are united there will be no need to be vigil or doubt one another since all the people will be as one. In that state, even distinguishing between Haman and Mordechai will become redundant, and the intoxication symbolizes that state of being.

"Haman's pockets" (also known as "Haman's Ears") represent the correction of the egoistic desires of Haman once all the people have united. This is why they are filled with sweet fillings, to symbolize the joy of unity. This is also why we offer gifts to one another and to the poor: a token of our enhanced connection.

The Message

To conclude, Purim is a festival that teaches us that all our woes come to us for lack of unity. Without it, we are persecuted, as during the exile in Babylon, during all the persecutions we have experienced throughout history, and as we are beginning to feel today. But with unity, we are safe and sound, and tipsy. So when nothing goes right, unite!

PURIM IS A FESTIVAL THAT TEACHES US THAT ALL OUR WOES COME TO US FOR LACK OF UNITY

JF&CS should stay independent, executive director says

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Jewish Family & Child's executive director is hoping that a government plan to amalgamate child protection service agencies won't affect the Jewish agency.

In the annual auditor general's report released in December, Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne called on the Ministry of Children and Youth Services to further centralize the co-ordination of child protection services and address problems with child protection standards, and lack of ministry oversight.

But Brian Prousky, JF&CS's new executive director, said this isn't the first time the government has called for reform and amalgamated children's aid societies (CAS).

In 2012, the Commission on Sustainable Child Welfare also resulted in the amalgamation of CAS organizations.

"In fact the most recent merger of two CASs occurred just last year... I've been in child welfare for 25 years. So I've seen the system go through times of growth and belt-tightening," said Prousky, who came to JF&CS after serving about 18 years with the Durham Children's Aid Society and York Region Children's Aid Society in various roles.

"In the commission's final report, it emphasized the importance of building a fully integrated children's service system and at the time [JF&CS was] viewed as a model organization. This was largely because of the integration of our child welfare services with 30 other programs and services we offer to families and children."

Prousky said he hopes JF&CS will be exempt from amalgamating with another CAS, such as the Catholic Children's Aid Society of Toronto, because of the "complexity" of the organization.

"First off, it's important to remember that Jewish Family & Child is not simply a Toronto agency. We also operate in York Region. So the process of amalgamating with another CAS would be far more complicated," he said.

"The government would also have to take into account that... we are a multi-service agency, which means that we don't really have a natural partner in the GTA. Our child protection services are fully integrated with our children's mental health and adult mental health services," he added.

Brian Prousky

"Finally, the province can proudly point to our agency, just like it can to Baycrest or Mount Sinai Hospital, as one of the many great parallel institutions Jews have built to serve the broader community."

Prousky said JF&CS also serves as a resource for other child protection agencies throughout the province in cases involving Jewish families and children.

"Our involvement in the recent Lev Tahor case highlighted this. In that instance, we worked closely with child welfare professionals in Chatham, Ont., to ensure the unique needs of Orthodox children brought into care were met. That is something that would be lost," Prousky said.

Prousky said JF&CS has been working with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs to "reach out to influential allies who can deliver a message to the highest levels of government about the important role our organization plays in the lives of children and families in the GTA and across the province."

He said that although neither his senior staff nor board members have been approached by government representatives about amalgamation yet, "we're concerned, and we want to make sure our voice is heard."

He said JF&CS is working with other children's aid societies to develop recommendations to improve how services are delivered. ■

Synagogue members mobilize to keep Shaar Shalom afloat

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

More than 100 years ago, when someone with a similar name had passed away, American writer Mark Twain noted with some relish that "reports of my death have been greatly exaggerated."

Members of Shaar Shalom Synagogue are feeling the same way after an announcement this month that the 44-year-old shul is set to close its doors June 30.

In a grassroots effort, some of them are trying to keep the shul operating.

At least two ad hoc groups are trying to find a way to keep the synagogue functioning, whether in its current location in the Don Mills Road and Steeles Avenue area, or in another venue, said longtime member Gerry Richler.

Richler, who emphasized he's speaking for himself and not the synagogue, said "a group of concerned individuals" had gathered to find a solution to the shul's problems.

"Simultaneously, other groups of people got in touch with other people" and now the groups have contacted each other. "Right now, people are trying to create some sort of structure, as well as identifying some possible alternatives to keep the congregation alive, whether in its present form or some other form."

Richler, a member of the shul for more than 30 years who once sat on its board, said there are options other than closing.

"What is important now is to reach out to the membership, present various alternatives, and gauge the level of support for those alternatives," Richler said.

On March 9, synagogue officials held an information meeting attended by more than 200 members. President Seymour Hersh told The CJN that with the departure of Rabbi Steven Schwarzman and Cantor Ben Silverberg, a drop in membership – from a peak of 555 members to 380 today – and demographic shifts in the neighbourhood reducing the nearby Jewish population, the shul planned to close its doors June 30.

Hersh clarified his remarks last week, saying, "The physical building is not sustainable at all." However, that does not preclude keeping the synagogue continuing as an organization, he added.

"We have a team of people interviewing all the Conservative shuls to identify collaborative opportunities," he said, "and another team looking at the value of the real estate, to assess the value of a potential sale."

Sam Chaim

Hersh said synagogue officials have been receiving inquiries and suggestions from members about the future of the shul. Some are offering suggestions to keep it viable. Others are asking what will happen to its artifacts, such as yahrzeit plaques and Torahs.

Hersh said the next few months will be busy, with proposals being offered, and communications between members and shul officials.

It's unclear what the synagogue's eventual future will be, but he said proposals will be winnowed down and presented to members for a vote at the next annual general meeting, scheduled for either May or June.

Some members have already "come back to us with proposals, some in great detail," Hersh said.

"Our intention will be to engage our members before the May or June time frame to make them part of the process."

Sam Chaim is one member eager to find a solution. A member since 1981, he recalls attending services in the early days in rented spaces at Fairview Mall, a hockey arena and Seneca College.

Chaim, who has served as synagogue president and on its board, believes Shaar Shalom is more than a building. "We're a family," he said.

If the building can't be saved, the congregation and sense of family among members can be retained, he believes.

"I don't think it's a fait accompli that the shul is going to close," he said.

Richler also believes there are options, including merging with another synagogue. "There are people who normally don't step to the plate who are stepping to the plate and looking for a solution," he said. ■

Ontario firm chosen to produce kosher chickens

plungen@thecjn.ca

Premier Kosher Inc., a company located in Smithville, southwest of Hamilton, has been granted the right to provide Ontario-raised and processed chickens to the kosher market.

Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO), which oversees the production and marketing of chickens in Ontario, announced March 17 that Premier was granted an allocation that will see it process 50,000 birds per week. The plant will be located in Abingdon, in the Niagara region, and is expected to begin operations in January 2017.

Paul Tzellos is president of Premier Kosher. Raised on poultry farms, he's been in the business in various capacities, including raising and transporting, for 40 years. Adding the processing component to the business has been a goal of his for years. Doing so while serving the Jewish community has special meaning, he said.

"We believe in the covenantal word with Abraham. We are honoured to work with the Jewish community."

Tzellos said Premier was late to the bidding process, but when the CFO was unable to find an appropriate producer, he entered the contest in August 2015. The company devoted a lot of time and energy to putting together the winning bid. He estimates his firm's financial commitment will be "$6 million, at the low end."

"Our goal is to start off and produce the highest quality kosher chicken we can provide. We want to be Chai's standards and higher. That's our goal," he said.

Tzellos was referring to Chai Poultry, which provided kosher chickens to Ontario consumers until it sold its quota to a halal producer and closed in May 2013. Since then, there have been no Ontario-produced kosher chickens. Marvid, a Quebec-based company, stepped into the breach, but consumers complained about their chickens' quality and that store shelves were often empty.

Tzellos said he had consulted with Chuck Weinberg, who owned Chai, for advice on technical matters and regarding community relations.

There may be another aspect to the relationship as well. Tzellos said the chickens, when they finally become available, will carry the Premier brand, but they may also be marketed as Chai chickens.

"It could be Chai in the future," he said. "We still haven't finalized it. There still are opportunities. People would like to see the Chai product on the shelves."

Paul Tzellos

According to a CFO news release, the Kashruth Council of Canada, known as COR, will work with Premier Kosher to provide kosher certification.

"Ontario's Jewish community has been looking forward to welcoming the arrival of a new kosher processing plant for several years to provide local Ontario-grown, fresh, kosher chicken," said Richard Rabkin, executive director of COR. "COR is pleased to be working with Premier Kosher Inc. to ensure that kosher consumers have a range of products in the marketplace to choose from."

Michael Edmonds, director of communications and government relations for CFO, said the agency is "very pleased. It was a long process. The board was doing its due diligence that the accepted applicant met all the criteria," including assets, access to a plant, financing, marketing and expertise in the sector.

Over the course of time, several applicants "dropped out."

"We would have liked to have done it quicker," he added.

CFO turned over the evaluation process to Deloitte, a consulting firm, because of their expertise in evaluating business plans, and its recommendation was examined by the CFO board.

Premier "made a strong business case," he said.

Edmonds said some of the bids that were withdrawn came up short in terms of familiarity with the industry, engineering knowledge, plant availability, secure financing and other requirements.

Edmonds said the plant being proposed by Premier has been used as "a red meat plant" and will need to be converted to handle chickens. COR will provide the supervision to ensure it meets kosher standards.

Edmonds rejected suggestions the CFO favoured COR over other certification agencies.

"There are a number of certification agencies in the marketplace. As far as we were concerned, all are acceptable." ■

When 'Hashem' is your Uber driver

SY BERG
NOT PARTICULARLY SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It was a typical Friday night.

I arrived at Mark's downtown Toronto apartment just after 9 p.m. My wife, Hagit, was pregnant with our first child, a boy, and had stayed home. We made the obligatory l'chaims, which led to loud, but thought-provoking, conversation. Donald Trump was yet again the topic of interest, and talk turned to his daughter, Ivanka, her Jewishness and which presidential candidate would be best for Israel.

"At least Donald's daughter is Jewish," Mark said as he poured the next round. "Bernie Sanders' step-kids aren't even Jewish."

I wondered if it bothered Trump that his daughter chose to embrace Judaism, as opposed to Christianity, Satanism, or whatever it was he raised her with.

Finally, I said quietly, "I'm impressed that Trump is still close to his daughter after she converted. I'd like to think that if our son wanted to convert, we'd support him, too."

Despite my friend's secularism, this didn't go over well. "That's terrible," Mark responded. "There's barely any of us left, and you're going to let your children leave, too?"

We argued for a while, but eventually we moved on to our destination: a quaint little bar on College Street. Yet despite my modern, liberal values, Mark's words stuck with me. Would it be a sin to let my son convert? And what would my parents think?

Finally, at 2:30 a.m., it was time to head home, so I ordered an Uber. A few minutes passed and a notification on my iPhone stopped me dead in my tracks. "Hashem is arriving now in a Toyota Camry," it read.

I laughed, figured my driver was from Iran, and got in the car.

"Welcome," Hashem said. I smiled and said hello, as my friends spilled out of the bar and waved. Waving back, I said, "My friends wanted me to go to some after-hours place, but I figured it's time to call it a night."

Hashem nodded. "Join the company of lions rather than assume the lead among foxes is what I always say."

"That's odd," I thought, laughing nervously.

"Beware of too much laughter," said Hashem, sensing my discomfort, "for it deadens the mind and produces oblivion."

"Another odd choice of words," I thought.

Steering the conversation in a more colloquial direction, I asked how he enjoyed being an Uber driver. "It is pleasant. The wheel always comes full circle," he replied, gesturing to his steering wheel.

Who was that mysterious man?

I was out of words, so we sat in silence for a while, until he said: "Something is bothering you."

It was more an observation than a question.

"Yes," I replied. "I'm having a crisis of faith." Then, for some reason, I let it all out. I told him about my pregnant wife, Ivanka Trump, conversion – the whole megillah.

Hashem listened intently. Finally, he spoke.

"You can educate a fool, but you cannot make him think," he said. "But you are no fool. Deep down, you know what you want from life."

"Well, I'd always dreamed I wouldn't end up a stubborn, uncompromising father," I said. "On the other hand, being Jewish has played a huge role in my life, and I want my children to experience that."

"A dream that is not interpreted is like a letter that is not read," Hashem replied. "Perhaps your dream is telling you that you want to be your own man and raise your children your own way. Even so, this does not necessarily mean you must deviate from your customs.

"Customs are more powerful than laws," he said.

I imagined taking my son to daven at the shul where I grew up. I thought about him lighting Shabbat candles and singing Dayeinu on Passover.

"Remember: when you teach your son, you teach your son's son," Hashem said, somehow reading my mind.

Finally, we arrived at my apartment. It may have been the alcohol, but I didn't realize how grateful I was for Hashem's wisdom. I told him it was by far the most peculiar, but enlightening, Uber experience I've ever had.

"Live well," Hashem said as he bid me farewell. "It is the greatest revenge." ■

'I'm not Irwin Cotler'

Other more moderate voices at the dinner took issue with the characterization of Trudeau as a modern-day Amalekite.

"Unlike his exalted predecessor, the much-beloved Stephen Harper, Trudeau seems to be walking around with blinders on when it comes to threats facing Israel and the Jewish People, but he doesn't appear to harbour any actual malice himself," said Shloime Kugel, CEO of the Centre for Israeli Stuff and Study (CISS), striking a conciliatory tone in a hastily prepared back-of-a-napkin statement couched in modifiers and hedge-words.

"Trudeau appears to be a blank slate, or an empty vessel into which – or onto which, if you prefer the blank slate metaphor – people can splash their greatest hopes or darkest fantasies and fears."

Meanwhile, recently elected Liberal MP Vittorio Denmother vigorously denied that his boss is a raging anti-Semite.

"Did no one listen during the election campaign to his denunciations of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement? Did no one hear him say that Canada is a staunch ally of Israel? Did anyone notice that we voted with Israel at the United Nations earlier this year? Is anyone even listening to me?" he asked rhetorically, staring at his shoes.

"Look, I may not be Irwin Cotler, but... never mind. I'm not Irwin Cotler. No one can be Irwin Cotler except Irwin Cotler. Let's just leave it at that."

NDP Leader Tom Mulcair, sitting alone at his table, added, "Did I mention that my wife is Jewish?"

He added, "Hey, do any of you guys know if she's coming tonight, by the way?"

Reached by phone at an interfaith dinner it organized on the same night, a representative of the left-wing Zionist group JSpaced Canada wouldn't comment on the Trudeau allegations, but said the level of political discussion in the Canadian Jewish community "has become so degraded that it's almost enough to drive one to drink, to the point where one can't distinguish between cursed is Harper and blessed is Trudeau – I mean, cursed is Trudeau and blessed is Harper. No, make that blessed is Haman... no – blessed is Mordechai... Oh, forget it."

In a rare public display of unity, the right-wing League of Offensive Jews and the anti-Zionist Independent Jewish Kvetchers held a joint protest outside the big tent. ■

'Latkes without pepper spray not as tasty'

"We want to make sure everyone at York is making a living wage. We have some other concerns, too, I just can't think of them at the moment, but mainly as a student government we have decided to concentrate on the students right here," White said.

Hillel at York also had no comment, although the message on its voice mail stated that it had advised students to vote "Chicago-style" – early and often – in advance polls.

The Hillel student executive and staff, numbering about 100 people, are currently on a mission to Israel, where they insisted they were locked in a stuffy convention centre studying how to write snappy slogans about the Jewish homeland, not "gallivanting around like those Birthright kids."

Meanwhile, the other Jewish group on campus, StandingWithHasbara Canada, also welcomed the change in government, although student leaders admitted they were starting to feel a little nostalgic for the "good old days" of monthly referendums about Israel and protests that seemed to magically coincide with Jewish holidays.

The group has scheduled a mammoth bonfire and party to get rid of their own protest signs and flyers, which will feature an Israeli band and a shaliach playing pioneer songs on an accordion.

"Our Chanukah party's just not going to be the same if we don't have to lock the doors and call campus police to get rid of the demonstrators," lamented one student.

"Yeah," complained another. "Latkes without pepper spray just won't be as tasty." ■

Jews need allies to fight anti-Semitism: Rabbi Sacks

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jews must work with Christians and Muslims in combating anti-Semitism because they simply do not have the numbers to do so alone, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks stressed in a March 14 address at Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

The former chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth said Jews have made "the terrible mistake" throughout their history of believing anti-Semitism is "our problem and we have to fight it on our own…

"I am going to be very blunt. There are 2.4 billion Christians in the world and 1.6 billion Muslims. We are outnumbered [at about 13 million]… If we are left to fight this battle on our own, we will be very vulnerable," he added. "Jews cannot and must not be left to fight anti-Semitism alone. The victim cannot cure the crime. The hated cannot cure the hater."

Jews should not hesitate to say to Christians and moderate Muslims, or those of goodwill of any faith, that they need them to stand with them, he said.

Since leaving the chief rabbi post in 2013 after 22 years, Rabbi Sacks has devoted himself to speaking and writing about spiritual matters and the need for interfaith co-operation. On March 2, he was awarded the Templeton Prize, an annual international award worth $1.6 million that recognizes outstanding contributions to the promotion of life's spiritual dimension.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks PBL PHOTOGRAPHY

Rabbi Sacks believes today's anti-Semitism is as pernicious as its earlier major expressions: religious hatred in the Middle Ages and racial hatred in the 19th century.

With these types of hatred no longer socially acceptable, Rabbi Sacks said contemporary anti-Semitism takes the form of anti-Zionism, that is, "hatred for their nation state, the right of Jews to have a space where they can defend themselves."

Just as anti-Semites looked to the church for their moral authority in the Middle Ages and to science in the post-Enlightenment, today's anti-Semites have co-opted the postwar era's most trusted guidepost – human rights – to justify their hatred, he said.

Israel has become the most egregious violator of human rights in the eyes of today's worst Jewish haters, he said.

He congratulated McGill University students and the Jewish community for rallying to defeat a boycott, sanctions and divestment motion put before the undergraduates' association last month. He urged all Jewish young people to act as "ambassadors of tolerance."

"We have an obligation as Jews to tell the world about Israel. They do not know what it is… Tell the simple truth… Israel has shown that it has gone from [experiencing] the worst of humanity to looking to the future and believing the world can be a better place," he said.

"Israel should not be the pariah of the world. It should be a symbol of hope for the world. Let us say that loud and clear."

Rabbi Sacks' Montreal visit was hosted by Federation CJA, which is embarking on the celebration of its centenary in 2017. He had a full day while in the city, speaking early in the morning to about 200 students from Jewish high schools.

Later he met with the Catholic Archbishop of Montreal, Christian Lépine, representatives of Montreal Christian-Jewish Dialogue and a number of professors of religion and political science, as well as leaders of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and its Canadian Rabbinical Caucus.

Rabbi Sacks also spoke March 16 in Toronto at an event co-sponsored by Aleh Canada and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. His latest book is Not in God's Name: Confronting Religious Violence.

Federation CJA president Evan Feldman said Rabbi Sacks' appearance at Shaar Hashomayim was an opportunity "to put aside our religious and cultural differences" and express the fundamental values all Jews share, primarily, that each is responsible for the other and for tikkun olam – repairing the world.

Rabbi Sacks, 68, born and raised in London in a working-class family to a Polish immigrant father, with most of his friends being not Jewish, said he "did not experience one episode of anti-Semitism." He attributed that to the world's determination of "never again" after the Holocaust.

That has not been the experience of his children, who since around the turn of the millennium have faced overt anti-Semitism in the guise of denunciation of Israel. "It came as a real shock to me," he said.

Anti-Semitism is comparable to a virus, he believes. It keeps mutating until the immune system – in this case all the anti-racism legislation, Holocaust education and interfaith dialogue since the war – became helpless to defend against it.

"We have to get non-Jews to understand that anti-Semitism is as much their problem as ours," just as persecution of Christians and Muslims is a concern for Jews, he said.

"The hate that begins with Jews does not end with Jews… Any society that has no room for Jews has no room for humanity itself… If it's not safe to be a Jew on the streets of Europe, then it is not safe to be a European." ■

Pro-Israel group barred from UOIT 'Social Justice Week'

sshefa@thecjn.ca

As Canadian director of the campus group Hasbara Fellowships, Robert Walker has come to expect anti-Israel hostility on campuses across North America.

But the outright exclusion by the University of Ontario Institute of Technology's (UOIT) student association from a "Social Justice Week" event was "jarring," he said.

Walker said when he acted on an invitation by the Oshawa-based school's student association to apply for a table at the Social Justice Week event that ran March 7 to 11 to promote Hasbara Fellowships' "Israel Peace Week" program, he was denied.

Walker said he received a rejection email from Denise Martins, executive assistant of UOIT's faculty association, that said since the student association passed a motion endorsing the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement in January, and because Hasbara Fellowships "seems closely tied to the State of Israel… it would be against the motion to provide any type of resources to your organization."

In a statement released by the student association in February, Siraj Syed, vice-president of university affairs, said "it is a priority of the SA to accept the BDS movement and join the international struggle in fighting for Palestinian rights."

UOIT's student association did not respond to The CJN's interview request, but released a statement defending its decision to exclude Hasbara Fellowships because of its mandate to promote a pro-Israel narrative. "The stated objectives of Hasbara Fellowships are in conflict with the objectives of Social Justice Week… Any organization whose mandate is to promote policies that contributes [sic] to the colonization of indigenous peoples, Palestinian or otherwise, does not align with the principles of social justice."

Walker said the programming at the event included anti-capitalist programming, Marxist-Leninist programing, as well as anti-Israel programming.

"I know well enough that there is widespread anti-Israel discrimination at universities across Canada and the U.S., but what surprised me was the explicit nature of the denial," Walker said. "There was no fear or shame in actually saying straight out that because you side with Israel, we don't want to provide you with a platform. I think it was a total lack of fear that was most jarring. What it suggests is that the discrimination is becoming more acceptable."

He said he reached out to UOIT's administration, but nothing was done. "I'm in the process of reaching out again to the administration and demanding that concrete steps be taken to rectify the situation," he said.

"Leadership comes from the top, and it is critical that the leadership of UOIT lead by example and make a public statement that will be heard not just at the university but across Canada that this discrimination is wholly unwelcome."

UOIT responded to the controversy with a statement on March 14 that said the university supports "respectful dialogue, dissent and discourse. This includes supporting freedom of speech and encouraging an inclusive, diverse and safe environment on campus. UOIT does not support a boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel [sic]… It is our hope that these expressions of concern will encourage the broadest range of participation and respectful dialogue at future events."

Walker said that he appreciates the support, but that response is insufficient.

"When a pro-Israel voice is purposefully silenced at a publicly funded university, words just aren't enough. Clear action must be taken by the university administration to rectify this egregious discrimination… The double standard applied during social justice week runs contrary to all Canadian values. Any university administration which permits or facilitates this double standard needs to be called out for doing so." ■

Should screening for breast cancer gene be expanded?

lsarick@thecjn.ca

Cancer researcher Kelly Metcalfe is unequivocal when asked what expanded testing for the gene linked to breast and ovarian cancer would mean for Jewish women.

"Do I think we could save lives if population-wide genetic testing was offered to all Jewish women, if they wish? Absolutely," she says.

Currently, no country offers widespread screening for mutations in the BRCA gene, which is linked to a significantly higher risk of breast and ovarian cancer. In Canada, typically only women who meet specific criteria, including having a family history of cancer, are eligible for the genetic tests.

But research studies in Israel, England and Canada have concluded that making screening available to all Jewish women would save women's lives and be cost effective, Metcalfe said.

The Canadian Cancer Society, which a few years ago had expressed reservations about expanded testing, is also increasingly convinced by the research.

"The Canadian Cancer Society encourages provincial and territorial health-care authorities to review their genetic testing guidelines and the evidence on the impact of expanding to Jewish women to ensure that the greatest number of people can benefit from these programs," Dr. Robert Nuttall, assistant director, health policy, said in a written statement sent to The CJN.

It's also important that genetic counselling be offered to help people understand the results and their options, Nuttall said.

Between one per cent and 2.5 per cent of Ashkenazi Jews, both men and women, carry a mutation that renders the BRCA gene less effective in preventing cancers. (For non-Jewish women about 1 in 500 carry a mutation.) Breast cancers attributed to the mutations tend to be more aggressive and occur in younger women.

A large-scale screening program at Toronto's Women's College Hospital that started in 2007 offered the test to all Jewish women, not only those with a family history of cancer. "It was absolute craziness. Women were trying to get at this test," recalled Metcalfe, an adjunct scientist at the Women's College Research Institute.

The research study, initially slated to test 2,000 women, added an additional 4,000 spots to accommodate the demand.

In a paper published in Current Oncology last summer, Metcalfe, the lead author, reported that 38 per cent of the women who tested positive for one of the three most common mutations had no family history that would have merited screening under the current guidelines.

The women's reactions to learning they carried the mutation, often without any inkling of trouble beforehand, were rapid. Within one year of testing positive, all of the women had more intensive MRI breast screening. Within two years, 90 per cent had undergone a prophylactic oophorectomy (surgical removal of ovaries and fallopian tubes), which is recommended because ovarian cancer is notoriously hard to detect until it is quite advanced. The surgery also reduces the risk of breast cancer.

The more intensive breast screening also caught cancer in some women earlier than it would have otherwise been detected.

"We identified women that would never have been identified. Because those women were identified before they had cancer, they did something with the test information," Metcalfe said in an interview. "I think we saved lives."

Natalie Witkin

Natalie Witkin was 30 when she learned she carried a BRCA mutation in 2000, just a few years after the genetic mutations were discovered by researchers in the United States and Canada. She was encouraged to be tested after a cousin developed breast cancer.

"Finding the mutation and learning about the mutation is a loss of innocence. It's a piece of information you can't unknow," she said.

"I'm glad that I know. At first it was certainly very difficult to find out. It weighed on me for months," she said.

Witkin did not know anyone outside her family in the same situation, and support groups only existed for people with a cancer diagnosis, not a genetic finding. It would be more than a decade before the most famous face of genetic testing, actor Angelina Jolie, would reveal that she, too, carried the faulty gene and had undergone a preventative mastectomy.

Witkin eventually started a support group for women like herself, and today, she's the director of partnerships and programs at Willow, Breast and Hereditary Cancer Support.

"In the end, I felt empowered and lucky to be able to take control of the outcome," she said.

"If I hadn't known [about the BRCA mutation], I would have woken up in my 40s with advanced cancer and then have very limited choices. "

The screening project at Women's College Hospital has since concluded, and women who want the test but do not meet the criteria can arrange for it privately, at a cost of about $500, Metcalfe said.

The study also demonstrated that it would save not only lives but also money. Each test costs researchers about $100, so the cost of finding the one woman in a hundred who carries the mutation is about $10,000.

The cost of surgery, chemotherapy and hormonal therapy for a woman with breast or ovarian cancer exceeds that, Metcalfe said.

Eventually, she would like genetic testing to be routine for Jewish men and women, since men who carry one of the BRCA mutations have a higher incidence of prostate and pancreatic cancer. A positive test for a man also has implications for his children, who may have inherited the mutation.

In the meantime, Metcalfe said it's just a matter of time before the test is offered routinely to Jewish women.

"We need to take small steps, this isn't trivial in terms of the cost. If we're going to be lobbying the government to expand testing, the first step is probably to women." ■

Exhibit highlights history of St. Catharines' Jewish community

ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

Visitors to the St. Catharines Museum and Welland Canals Centre are getting a look at the history of the city's Jewish community.

An exhibit titled B'nai Israel – The First Synagogue opened in January and is on display until the end of the year. It includes photographs and artifacts detailing more than 150 years of history.

While visiting the museum last summer, B'nai Israel member Pearl Katzman noticed a lot of space in the windows and thought of the idea to share some Judaica. When the museum curator agreed, Katzman and a group of volunteers got to work researching and collecting artifacts.

"One window has artifacts, including a Torah, a shofar, something from all of the holidays," said Katzman. "The other shows our community involvement over more than 100 years, including articles and photographs.

The collection is on display to the end of 2016.

"It has been very well received. There is a lot of excitement about the history."

The congregation's first services were held some time around 1865 at the home of Phillip Ginsberg on Church Street, and later in facilities rented on Niagara Street. In 1902, a house was purchased for $3,500 at Church and Calvin streets to be the first permanent synagogue building. In 1923, ground was broken at the current location on Calvin Street. Construction was completed in 1925 at a cost of $ 26,500.

Originally an Orthodox synagogue, B'nai Israel has been a member of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for 30 years. It is the only Conservative egalitarian synagogue in Niagara Region and has a membership of about 150 families.

"Of course we were interested in this exhibit," said Kathleen Powell, the museum's curator and supervisor of historical services. "We like to be able to tell as many of the stories of St. Catharines history as possible. The reception to the exhibit has been excellent so far. We expect as our busier season approaches that the exhibit will get even more attention. Even more than that, this exhibit has provided the museum the opportunity to connect with a new partner in the community, which only serves to make what we do richer."

Katzman remembers the day she received a phone call from the museum. Amid archives and items in the museum basement, staff members were excited to find a seder plate that a former rebbetzin had given to the city.

"This exhibit is important because it is our responsibility as the keeper of the community's heritage to be able to tell all the stories of our community," Powell said. ■

Will Istanbul bombing bring Turkey and Israel together?

Raphael Ahren
JERUSALEM

Will Saturday's devastating terror attack in Istanbul lead to an improvement in bilateral ties between Ankara and Jerusalem?

Those looking for a silver lining to the tragic event March 19 in which three Israeli civilians were killed can point to the smooth co-operation and the sympathetic messages exchanged by officials from both countries. But while several signals indicate that some sort of detente is in the offing, experts on Israel-Turkey ties warn that a full-fledged reconciliation might still not be around the corner.

The co-ordination between Israeli and Turkish officials dealing with the immediate aftermath of the attack in Istanbul was excellent, according to people on the ground.

"The Health Ministry, Prime Minister's Office, the hospitals – even the funeral homes were amazing," said diplomat Shira Ben Tzion, who was in charge of Israel's Istanbul consulate at the time of the attack. "We are used to hostility on the streets," she told Yedioth Ahronoth, "but in this case, from the moment we said we're from the Israeli Consulate, they embraced us straight away and treated us nicely."

Even on a much higher level, Saturday's attack seemed to bring the two sides closer together. That evening, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu received a letter of condolence from his Turkish counterpart Ahmet Davutoglu, a man not usually know for his high regard for Israel's current political leadership.

"Today's attack in Istanbul has shown us once again that the international community as a whole should act in a resolute manner against the ignoble objectives of terrorist organizations," Davutoglu wrote. "I would like to convey my condolences to the families of the Israeli citizens who lost their lives in the heinous attack which happened in Istanbul and to the people of Israel, and wish a speedy recovery to the wounded."

Davutoglu's missive came less than one week after Netanyahu condemned a large-scale terror attack in Ankara, expressing "solidarity with the Turkish people in the war against terrorism."

The statement was newsworthy because Netanyahu had refrained from speaking out on previous attacks rocking Turkish cities, reportedly due to his anger at Ankara's refusal to condemn the wave of terror currently rocking Israel.

When Irem Aktas, a member of Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan's ruling AK Party, tweeted on Saturday that she wished for the death of the Israelis wounded in the attack, the party quickly initiated disciplinary proceedings against her.

"These are all things that we haven't seen before in bilateral relations," said Nimrod Goren, a Turkey expert at Hebrew University.

"The level of co-operation, on a working level but also on a diplomatic level, is more intense that it had been in the past. And apparently it's going quite well; so far we've heard no complaints from one side about the other," Goren said.

That fact that Aktas' hateful tweet was quickly and forcefully rejected by higher-ups in Erdogan's party indicates that verbal attacks against Israel are being delegitimized in today's Turkey, Goren added. "All of these developments together form a picture showing open lines of communication and that Turkey is trying to project a better atmosphere," he said.

> We are trying to reach an understanding with [Turkey]
> Benjamin Netanyahu

And yet, this cautious rapprochement by no means guarantees that Jerusalem and Ankara will soon finalize a reconciliation agreement and fully normalize diplomatic ties, he believes. "There are concrete disagreements before it can be signed, and they are not removed by the most recent events. But what this development does achieve is creating a more relaxed atmosphere to conduct these negotiations in."

Addressing reporters Saturday night, Netanyahu reiterated that Israel is constantly trying to reach an agreement that will lead to normalization of ties with the Turks. "This matter is being delayed not because of frivolous reasons," he said, "but because of fundamental issues about which we are trying to reach an understanding with them. There was a certain progress, and I hope that it will continue."

Netanyahu is referring to Gaza – Ankara requests Israel lift its naval blockade of the Strip, which Israel opposes adamantly – as well as Jerusalem's concern over senior Hamas leaders based in Turkey. Israel demands Turkey prevent any Hamas activity from its territory as a precondition to normalization.

Indeed, an overly hurried reconciliation might not necessarily be in Israel's best interest, argued Efrat Aviv, a Turkey expert at Bar-Ilan University.

During a recent visit to Turkey, Israeli diplomats told her that the status quo is actually not so bad. Trade relations are good, she explained, tourism is up, and Israel is participating in cultural festivals in Turkey and generally has little to complain about. "Why do we need to pay the price and give in to Turkey's demands to improve ties, given Turkey's current volatile state?"

She said there's no need to rush into signing a reconciliation agreement. "Maybe it's not nice to take advantage of another country's weak situation, but we need to look out for our national interests. Turkey is struggling with terrorism and we could help them. Turkey thus needs us more than we need them. The way things are today, it is not in Israel's strategic interest to rush to fix ties with Turkey."

While Erdogan is keenly interested in restoring ties with Israel, Aviv continued, he is giving Israel few reasons to believe he is sincere about true reconciliation. "If tomorrow there's another war with Hamas, will he again say that we're worse than Hitler? Why do we rush to normalize relations with a country that supports Hamas, promotes anti-Semitism and terrorism?"

Eventually, she allowed, restoring full diplomatic ties is desirable. "But let us take some time. Let's build up bilateral relations slowly. Let them prove that they are really interested in reconciliation. Let's first see a real change in their behaviour."

Canadian rabbis hope to fill shuls with Trump refugees

SHODIE JEWPAC
STAFF PURIM HUMOURIST

In an effort to boost flagging attendance at their shuls, hundreds of Canadian rabbis spanning the denominational spectrum have signed an open letter inviting U.S. Jews to join their congregations if "the s--t hits the fan" and Donald Trump is elected president of the United States.

"You scratch our backs, we'll scratch yours. New American blood could be just what we need," the letter reads.

In a move the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), representing 1,000 Orthodox rabbis, referred to in a press release as "unprecedented, but, we get it," close to 400 rabbis – including a significant number of American expatriates, according to a quick Google search – came together in a show of solidarity with Jews south of the border who will likely be voting for Hillary Clinton.

The March 16 letter represented a cross-section of congregations, from Orthodox to Reconstructionist and was penned by a group describing itself as "a bunch of concerned clergy." Posted on an open petition site, it featured the signatures of 387 rabbis and spiritual leaders from British Columbia to Newfoundland, as well as one from St. Pierre and Miquelon, an archipelago off Newfoundland that an RCA spokesperson said "he wasn't convinced actually exists."

Loosely addressed to "American Jews who fear Trump and the mesmerizing power of his comb-over" and circulated widely on social media, the letter calls on U.S. Jews who oppose Trump's politics and "general, but definitely not cute, wackiness" to "go ahead and jump ship to Canada" if the Republican frontrunner is elected and, once here, to "consider themselves welcome at the Canadian synagogue of their choosing."

It further reads: "With the U.S. presidential election this fall following close on the heels of the High Holidays, what better time to relocate to Canada and settle into the rhythm of a new shul?"

The clergy want to boost Shabbat attendance with an appeal to U.S. Jews DAVID HERRERA PHOTO

With a nod to Trump's recent primary victory in Florida – which the letter called "the retirement home of our people" – the rabbis acknowledge that some American Jews do appear to be Trump supporters, but they stress that anyone concerned about leaving the United States and settling in a new, foreign land with "strange, vaguely socialist tendencies" shouldn't have to add "the stress of finding a new spot to daven" to their list of worries.

One of the signatories, Rabbi Daniela Godenstein-Baum of Burnaby, B.C.'s Reform synagogue Kehilat Neshama, told The CJN she first learned about the letter on Twitter and subsequently heard "from a colleague" that the individuals who authored it wished to remain anonymous.

"I was excited to see rabbis from all over the country banding together on such an important issue. But more importantly, there aren't a lot of Jews in Burnaby. Not to be crass, but we could use some extra tushes in the pews on Rosh Hashanah," she said.

Rabbi Noah Moskowitz-Chandler of Shaarei Shaul, a modern Orthodox synagogue in Toronto, said that "our American brothers and sisters should rest assured they will, if that meshugene Trump gets elected, have a welcoming place to daven and observe a rich and meaningful Jewish life."

Rabbi Moskowitz-Chandler believes the Americans will likely integrate quickly.

"These people aren't voting for Trump, so they're probably not going to bring their guns to shul, in case that was a concern."

Rabbi Jonathan Steinberg-Greenberg of Montreal's Conservative Shaarei Gold, said he chose to sign the letter out of "deep sympathy for Americans contemplating uprooting their lives to avoid being governed by what a madman."

"And I don't mean Bernie," he added.

He was further motivated by his personal ties to the United States.

"I'm a rabbi. I'm from Cleveland," he droned, adding, "It's fine here. The bagels are sub-par, but it's ultimately fine."

Ma'ayan Goldwater, another signatory and spiritual leader of Montreal's unaffiliated Congregation Yonah, said her vaguely humanist community has always "provided a safe space for people to enrich their Jewish spiritual practice in whatever way nourishes them."

That includes, she said, Americans who decide to flee Trump's America, "Jewish, not Jewish, whatever."

She added: "Americans, we welcome you to our congregations with open arms via our wide open borders."

A spokesperson for Immigration Canada subsequently clarified that Canada's borders are not, in fact, wide open – "even," she said, "to Americans." ■

The Jewish life of Supreme Court nominee Garland

URIEL HEILMAN
JTA, WASHINGTON

Merrick Garland

Americans have heard a lot about Merrick Garland since U.S. President Barack Obama nominated him to fill the vacant seat on the Supreme Court. But there's a lot we still don't know.

What are his views on abortion? Will the Republican leadership give him a hearing in the Senate? What was his bar mitzvah Torah portion?

Garland may have an extensive judicial record – he has more federal judicial experience (19 years) than any other Supreme Court nominee in history, according to the White House – but far less is known about Garland's Jewish bona fides.

Here's what we do know:

He is proud of his family's Jewish immigrant story – enough so to cite it in his speech at the announcement of his nomination March 16 in the White House Rose Garden.

"My family deserves much of the credit for the path that led me here," Garland said. "My grandparents left the Pale of Settlement at the border of western Russia and eastern Europe in the early 1900s, fleeing anti-Semitism and hoping to make a better life for their children in America."

His father, Cyril Garland, was born in Omaha, Neb., but hailed from a Latvian Jewish immigrant family. He ran an advertising business out of the family home and died in 2000. Garland's mother, Shirley Garland, still lives in the Chicago area and at one point served as director of volunteer services at the Council for Jewish Elderly in Chicago.

Garland was raised in Lincolnwood, a heavily Jewish suburb of Chicago, and had his bar mitzvah at a Conservative synagogue. Garland has credited his parents with instilling in him the desire for public service.

"His Jewish tradition is one of service," Jamie Gorelick, who went to college with Garland and worked closely with him in the Justice Department, told the New York Times. Gorelick was the U.S. deputy attorney general from 1994 to 1997.

At Niles West High School in Skokie, Ill., Garland served as student council president, acted in theatrical plays and was voted "most intelligent" boy in the class of 1970, the Times reported.

When Garland started as an undergraduate at Harvard University, where he was on scholarship, he thought he wanted to be a doctor and initially entered a pre-med track. But he quickly changed focus and settled on another respectable Jewish path: lawyer. After graduating Harvard College, he went on to Harvard Law School.

Garland's wife, Lynn Rosenman, is a fellow Jewish Harvard graduate who hails from a distinguished family. Her grandfather, Samuel Rosenman of New York, was a state Supreme Court justice and a special counsel to two presidents: Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman.

Garland and his wife met at a rehearsal dinner where they were seated together. They married in 1987 in a Jewish ceremony at the Harvard Club in New York presided over by a Reform rabbi, Charles Lippman.

The couple settled in the Washington, D.C. area and there raised two daughters, both now in their 20s. Garland and his wife live in Bethesda, Md., and are members of Temple Sinai, a 1,100-member Reform congregation in Washington led by Rabbi Jonathan Roos. Both the Garland daughters, Rebecca and Jessica, reportedly had their bat mitzvahs there.

The Garlands have hosted some distinguished guests for their Passover seders. In 1996, then-U.S. attorney general Janet Reno was a seder guest. She and Garland had to step away from the table at one point to take a phone call regarding the investigation into Ted Kaczynski, the so-called Unabomber, who was arrested on Passover eve. Garland oversaw Kaczynski's prosecution.

Garland also has hosted Easter egg hunts – part of an annual potluck breakfast he holds for his former clerks and their spouses and children, according to the Washington Post.

The judge has worked in a variety of roles since moving to Washington, D.C., in the 1970s. He started as a court clerk at the U.S. Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court before joining the law firm Arnold & Porter. After just a few years, Garland gravitated toward government work, first working as an assistant U.S. attorney and later as a deputy assistant attorney general in the criminal division of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Then president Bill Clinton nominated Garland to be a U.S. circuit court judge in 1995, but the Republican-controlled Senate dragged its feet on confirming him. After Clinton won re-election in 1996 he renominated Garland, and the judge was confirmed in March 1997 by a 76-23 vote in the Senate.

Jay Michaelson, a rabbi and columnist for The Daily Beast and the Jewish Daily Forward who clerked for Garland on the Appeals Court in the late 1990s, said Garland's Jewish identity is typical of that of many American Jews.

"My sense is he wasn't super religious or observant but very culturally Jewish – like a lot of American Jews," Rabbi Michaelson told JTA. "I think the immigrant experience and Jewish ethical values would be the two most important aspects of his Jewish identity."

Rabbi Michaelson remembered talking with the judge about needing to take off four days for Sukkot and Simchat Torah. The two had a joking exchange about it, and Garland of course gave him the days off, Rabbi Michaelson said.

"My experience clerking for him is that he was very methodical, detailed and sharp," Rabbi Michaelson said. "He was extremely detail-oriented, determined, nerdy in a good way and quite meticulous."

The White House released a three-minute biographical video on Garland this week.

"I think the rule of law is what distinguishes our country from most other countries," Garland says in the video. "It's people's willingness to trust that they don't have to take justice into their own hands, that law will treat people fairly and impartially, and without regard to politics or religion or race or anything else."

The two elements of Garland's biography that have generated the most attention since Obama nominated him to the Supreme Court have nothing to do with his Jewishness.

One is that he's a relative moderate compared to other potential jurists a Democratic president could have nominated. The other is that he is 63 – relatively old by Supreme Court nominee standards. That makes it less likely he will serve a long term on the court.

Both elements are being seen as concessions to make Obama's pick more palatable to Senate Republicans – or at least make it harder for them to refuse him a hearing. So far, the Republican leadership has vowed not to bring Garland's nomination to a vote before the November presidential election.

The fact that Garland is a Jewish, male, white Harvard graduate is tertiary. The court is already stacked with those: Of the eight sitting justices, five are men, six are white, three are Jews and all eight went to law school either at Harvard or Yale University. (Ruth Bader Ginsburg graduated from Columbia University after transferring there from Harvard.) If confirmed, Garland would be the court's ninth-ever Jewish judge.

"We're on the one hand super proud that we have a Reform Jew who is being nominated to the Supreme Court. It's a wonderful affirmation of this jurist," said Rabbi Jonah Pesner, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism.

Rabbi Pesner noted that his friends at Temple Sinai are "ecstatic" about one of their own being nominated to the highest court in the land. "On the other hand," Pesner said, "we believe of course that faith should never be a litmus test for office." ●

Biden calls Israeli, Palestinian apathy 'disappointing'

JTA
WASHINGTON

Israelis and Palestinians must revive their will for peace, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden told AIPAC in a speech that earned thunderous applause for emotional expressions of affection for Israel and scattered boos for criticism of settlements.

Biden's speech Sunday March 20 to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee annual conference will be his last as a public official to the Israel lobby, and the cheers he earned throughout reflect his status as the Obama administration official most loved by the pro-Israel community.

"There is a lack of political will among Israelis and Palestinians to move forward," Biden said he concluded from his talks with both sides during his trip to Israel earlier this month. "And that's incredibly disappointing."

In describing the conditions behind the loss of will for peacemaking, Biden emphasized repeatedly the need for Palestinians and others in the Arab world to end incitement.

"No matter what the disagreements the Palestinian people may have with Israel, there is no excuse for killing innocents or remaining silent in the face of terrorism," Biden said to the record-breaking 18,000 activists in attendance.

He said he delivered that message to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, earning the conference's first standing ovation. "The terrorism has to stop, the incitement ... it must stop," said Biden, who, at 73, jogged onto the stage, but whose voice was hoarse.

A good portion of his speech was devoted to condemning terrorism and incitement, and to warning the Palestinians not to seek statehood unilaterally, but Biden also said Israel too should refrain from acts that would scuttle a peace plan.

He cited "steady and systematic" settlement expansion and the sanctioning of illegal settlement outposts under the government of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The remarks earned Biden a scattering of boos from across the cavernous hall.

Biden tied anti-Semitism, particularly in Europe, to the "seemingly organized" effort to delegitimize Israel, condemning the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against the country to the rising tide of anti-Semitism.

> There is no excuse for killing innocents or remaining silent in the face of terrorism.

"No nation is immune from criticism, but it should not be singled out," he said.

Meanwhile, U.S. Republican front-runner Donald Trump reiterated his claim to be the most pro-Israel person while pledging to outline his vision for a "good" peace deal between Israel and the Palestinians in his address at AIPAC the next day.

Speaking to ABC's The Week the day before his scheduled AIPAC appearance, Trump said a peace agreement with the Palestinians is in Israel's interest and maintained that if he wins the presidency, "I'm going to be giving that a very good shot.

"There is no one more pro-Israel than I am," said Trump. "I think making a deal would be in Israel's interest."

The presidential hopeful said all the Jews he knows are in favour of a peace accord, but a "good deal, not an Obama-type deal.

"I'll tell you what, I don't know one Jewish person that doesn't want to have a deal. A good deal. A proper deal. But a really good deal. But I would say it's probably one of the toughest deals... in the world to make, because there's just so many decades of hatred between the two sides," he said.

"I think it's something we should try very hard to get," he added.

During the interview, Trump said he would outline what a "good deal" means in his address at the pro-Israel conference. The CJN went to press before he addressed the conference.

Republican candidates Ted Cruz and John Kasich were also scheduled to address the three-day conference, as will Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton. Citing his campaign schedule, other Democratic Party hopeful Bernie Sanders said he would not address the conference. ■

Heavyweights address conference on anti-Semitism

plungen@thecjn.ca

If you can judge the weight politicians give an issue by their participation in conferences, then western parliamentarians consider manifestations of anti-Semitism of grave concern.

From March 13 to 15 in Berlin, German Chancellor Angela Merkel delivered an address to the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA). She was joined at the conference by the country's justice minister, as well as representatives of all the country's political parties.

The fact the gathering – the third after similar conferences in the United Kingdom (2009) and Canada (2010) – was held in Germany was "important symbolically and substantially," said Irwin Cotler, the former Canadian justice minister who was instrumental in creating the ICCA.

"It was a very representative and compelling expression of German leadership," he added.

Speaking March 14 to more than 100 legislators from some 40 countries, Merkel said "Anti-Semitism and other prejudices have no place in our society."

"If gravestones are defaced, then our country itself is defaced. If synagogues are vandalized, this shakes the foundations of our free society," Merkel said.

Cotler noted that the event was held 80 years after the German parliament enacted the Nuremberg race laws, which targeted Jews, adding to its significance.

He said a "common theme" that ran through the conference was that "anti-Semitism is the oldest and most enduring of hatreds, and most lethal, and it is rearing its ugly head again today."

What's more, parliamentarians recognize that Israel has emerged as a target of anti-Semites as a "Jew among the nations."

Cotler, who recently founded the Raoul Wallenberg Centre for Human Rights, said Merkel's address was particularly powerful. She condemned anti-Semitism and pledged that Germany will combat it by all means necessary.

According to news reports, Merkel said demonstrators who call for the destruction of Israel are simply "giving vent to hatred of Jews." In so doing, they "abuse the fundamental rights in our country to freedom of association and expression."

As part of the conference, Cotler chaired a panel on the legal response to anti-Semitism. The justice ministers of Israel, Germany, Britain and Australia participated, while Ana Birchall, chair of the committee on European affairs of the chamber of deputies of Romania, was the panel respondent.

Israeli Apartheid Week and the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement were specifically addressed by the panel, and Michael Gove, Britain's secretary of state for justice, noted that the United Kingdom will not provide public funds to bodies calling for BDS targeting Israel, Cotler said.

Jewish News Online reported from Britain that Gove pointed out that, "Jews still live in fear" of modern manifestations of anti-Semitism.

"In the Middle Ages, anti-Semitism was focused on the religious identity of Jewish people... Today, it targets the collective identity of the Jewish People," he said.

Cotler said parliamentarians left the conference recognizing the need to adopt a common definition of anti-Semitism. Current "developed indices" refer to claims of Jewish power and control over the media, but new indices are needed for more contemporary manifestations of anti-Semitism, he said.

Cotler suggested "genocidal anti-Semitism," such as the Iranian call to eliminate Israel and the demonization of Israel through accusations of apartheid and racism, should be accepted as part of the definition.

Adopting a common definition could lead to more effective information gathering, monitoring and law enforcement while providing a tool when approaching Internet service providers (ISPs) over concerns Internet users are violating an ISP's code of conduct, he said. ■

Former Mossad head buried

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lays a wreath at the funeral of former Mossad director Meir Dagan on March 20. Dagan, who headed Israel's foreign intelligence and special operations organization for nearly a decade until 2011, died March 17 in a Tel Aviv hospital following a long battle with cancer. He was 71. He served as a national security adviser to Israel's former prime minister Ariel Sharon, who appointed him director-general of Mossad in August 2002. Netanyahu said Dagan was a "daring fighter and commander who greatly contributed to the security of the state."

Arson not cause of fire in Duma home

JTA
JERSUALEM

Arson was not the cause of a fire that damaged the Duma home of a key witness in a deadly attack last year in the same West Bank Palestinian village, police believe.

Ibrahim Dawabsheh, the owner of the house, and his wife escaped from the burning home early on the morning of March 20 and were treated in a West Bank hospital for smoke inhalation, the Palestinian Maan news agency reported.

He is the key witness to the July 2015 attack that killed his relatives Reham and Saad Dawabsheh, and their 18-month-old son, Ali Saad, and seriously injured Ali's older brother. Ibrahim Dawabsheh is testifying in the murder trial of the suspected bomber, Amiram Ben-Uliel, 21, and his 17-year-old alleged accomplice.

The Israel Police and the Shin Bet security service, who are investigating the early Sunday morning fire, said in a statement issued that night that investigators have not found any indication the attack was nationalistically motivated or any evidence it was an arson attack. Some details of the investigation remain under a gag order.

"The findings so far at the scene are not consistent with the characteristics of a deliberate arson attack by Jews," the joint statement said.

Palestinian officials have said they believe the attack on the home, which is located about 10 yards from the house that was burned down last year, was arson.

A bedroom window in the house was broken, with shattered glass inside, the French news agency AFP reported, citing local residents.

"The window was broken from the outside and flammable materials were found in the rubble," Col. Malek Ali, fire chief for the nearby city of Nablus, told AFP.

Ghassan Daghlas, a Palestinian Authority official, told the Palestinian Maan news agency that it is clear Jewish settlers attacked the home.

"The way they attacked, the type of firebombs and the timing of the attack, all indicate that it was Israeli settlers," he said.

Robert Piper, the United Nations co-ordinator for humanitarian assistance and development aid, in a statement condemned what he called the "arson attack by suspected Jewish extremists."

"This violent act could easily have resulted in a more tragic outcome, as did the heinous terrorist attack last July on the home of Mr. Dawabsheh's relatives in the same village," he said. ■

Teen snowboarder has his sights on the Olympics

plungen@thecjn.ca

There's an old joke that illustrates just what it takes to excel in an area of interest.

A guy was wandering the streets of New York City, looking for a famous building that he couldn't find. Finally he asks a stranger, "How do you get to Carnegie Hall?"

"Practice," came the smart-ass retort.

Practice never hurt anybody trying to excel in music – or in sports, for that matter, as Corey Farber's recent success in snowboarding attests. Farber, a Grade 11 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus, finished first in Level II of giant slalom snowboarding, the highest for his age group, at a recent competition that brought together the very best high school snowboarders in the province, under the auspices of OFSAA, the Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations.

He scored top marks in the giant slalom, beating his second place challenger and he flamed out on the second of two runs, by nearly three seconds.

A week later, Farber finished ninth in the Snowboard Ontario PSL Provincial Championship, competing in the open category against guys years older than himself.

And next week he's slated to compete in the Alpine and SBX Nationals in Quebec.

All that success didn't just happen. Farber, 16, loves his sport and dedicates lots of time and energy to it. On weekends he spends much of two days on the slopes of Blue Mountain, training with the other members of the Alpine Ski Club.

Back at CHAT, he works out with the help of his gym teacher, focusing on balance and strengthening his core. He's got a gym in his home and once a week a trainer shows up and puts him through his paces, working on leg strength, core and conditioning.

Now in his third year of competitive snowboarding, Farber has seen the hard work pay off. Besides winning the OFSAA event, his ninth place finishes at the provincials, in both slalom and giant slalom, marked a significant improvement over his results last year, when he finished 14th.

"That's a pretty big leap," he said.

Slalom and giant slalom races take place over courses of the same length, though there are more gates to navigate in slalom races. There were 20 gates to passing the OFSAA giant slalom and he did it in around 36 seconds, going past a gate just about every two seconds.

That's where the experience of previous competitions comes in, Farber said. Every course is different, conditions can vary and so you've got to make corrections as conditions dictate. You've got to feel your way around the course, keep your head up and look ahead at least a gate or two. "You can't be late on the turns," he said.

When he first started with the sport, "it was a little nerve-racking to turn the board," he said. "As the years go on, you get more experienced and learn how races work and what you should do. It really is in technique. The smallest of errors can cost you the entire race."

Farber got his start on the slopes at seven years of age. After a couple of years on skis, he switched to snowboards. "It's new, so all the kids want to try it... We thought it was much cooler."

As Farber vaults into provincial and national levels, he finds the sport takes him further and further afield. He's skied competitively in events in Colorado, British Columbia and across the province.

But why stop there? Last year, he missed out on making the junior national team by 25 points. He figures he could make up that difference by improving his performance in as little as three races. Once on the national team, the sky's the limit.

"I've always wanted to go to the Olympics. It would be just amazing if I could represent Canada," he said.

And unlike the guy looking for Carnegie Hall, he knows how to get there – through practice. ■

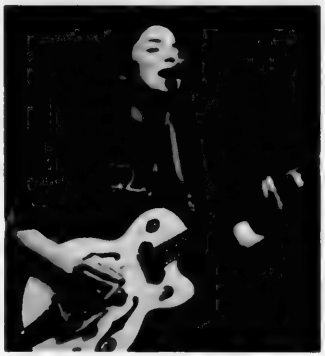
Heartbeat graduates play debut show in Toronto

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca



Rasha Nahas

The nature of collaborating musically is such that people need to listen to each other, explained Aaron Shneyer, founder and director of Heartbeat, an Israeli non-profit that since 2007 has brought Israeli and Palestinian youth musicians together to play music and build mutual trust and understanding.

"That's something unique to our program that other dialogue programs don't have. That skill [of listening to each other] is then translated into the youths' relationships and conversations," Shneyer, who's based in Washington, D.C., said.

On March 28, two Heartbeat graduates, Israeli Dana Herz and Palestinian Rasha Nahas – both professional musicians – will perform alongside Shneyer at Toronto's Small World Music Centre, followed by a conversation about the organization.

The concert is part of a North American tour designed to engage local Canadian and U.S. communities in the work done by Heartbeat, which is primarily funded through donations and grants from North America, and hopefully to garner the financial support to expand it. Heartbeat's core initiative, currently taking place in Haifa and Jerusalem, brings together ensembles of musically inclined Israeli and Palestinian high school students who, for two years, meet for weekly, music-based dialogue sessions.

"Each high school chapter really identifies itself as a band. They're building a repertoire and working on the same sort of personal dynamics that you'd find in any group of friends or musicians," Shneyer said.

After graduating from college, Shneyer, 32, got involved with American peace-building organization Seeds of Peace, first working as a music counsellor at its international summer camp in Maine, and subsequently doing work for it in Tel Aviv and Ramallah.

"As powerful as that work was, I was yearning for a way to do more with music and to explore how it empowers people to make change," he said.

In the spring of 2007, he received a grant from Fulbright in partnership with MTV for his proposal to start a band made up of 12 Israeli and Palestinian high school students from west and east Jerusalem. "The plan was for them to explore music together and learn about each other's backgrounds, and about music as a tool for education," Shneyer said.

The pilot band worked together for nine months before performing a finale concert that he said drew 300 people.

"It seemed too powerful and exciting to stop there, so we kept going," he said.

Nine years later, each chapter – typically comprising 8 to 12 students, split evenly between Israelis and Palestinians – is guided by an Israeli and a Palestinian staff member trained in music and dialogue facilitation.

"The staff is able to alternate where needed between spoken dialogue between the students, wherein they put their instruments aside, and musical workshops that improve the kids' ability to create music," Shneyer noted.

Heartbeat also offers a graduate program to students who have completed the high school track. In it they develop leadership and activism skills, and take what they've learned into their communities.

Shneyer said about 100 youth participants have been through Heartbeat's programs. They typically come from diverse musical backgrounds, with interests ranging "from classical to hip hop to jazz to heavy metal… some who come have never written a song before, and some are studying composition."

He said that "negotiating between different musical styles" is a key component of each band's bonding process.

"Our work is really about equalizing spaces, because these sorts of spaces don't exist… in these youths' daily lives. We're trying to challenge that status quo and get young people from both sides to see each other as equals, to confront the social evasion of each other [that's encouraged of them]," he said.

Shneyer said each group typically has an initial period of becoming friends and building trust, during which they're often hesitant to address political issues.

"Then, when they're ready, they can raise those things with each other without it tearing the group apart, because they've created a space for compassionate listening and empathy," he said. ■

Shared personal stories open a dialogue on mental health

JORDAN ADLER

Every Wednesday, a first-person story is published on The Dialogue Projects TPD), a website co-founded by three Torontonians. The author of the story is typically female, and usually around the age of a university student. The subjects of the stories are anything but small: illness, suffering, psychological confusion, substance abuse.

The tales are raw, but the reactions from an online community are swift. Shared on social media sites like Facebook, these stories receive a torrent of positive comments. They educate others about personal struggle, while offering a helpful resource to those who may be suffering in silence.

The writers are doing much to add a voice to a subject worthy of immense dialogue: living with mental health difficulties.

Their columns are a weekly staple for The Dialogue Projects (note the plural). The social enterprise wants to end the stigmas and stereotypes surrounding mental illness. When someone exposes the details of a very personal challenge, and that story resonates with an audience, it encourages more people to add to the conversation.

"When people feel like they are part of a family, part of a community, when they have something where they can identify their own experience, [the stories] start piling in like a domino effect," says Caroline Kassie, one of TDP's founders.

The backlog of stories built up instantly. Co-founder Ashley Steinhauer Otto says she and her partners never had to reach out to people they knew for personal stories. Each comes from a person yearning to reach out and share her experience.

The project began in the summer of 2014 – a season that saw much discussion over the suicide of actor Robin Williams.

"We saw that the media was finally starting to pick up on the topic of mental health," Kassie says. "It was important that the dialogue had started and we wanted to keep it going."

With their third co-founder, Carly Bennie, and the company's chief marketing officer, Lauren Kimel-Wise, the women began the social enterprise with the goal of creating a dialogue, as well as giving money to local mental health programs. A line of fashionable products was developed to raise money.

On these accessories, such as the TDP tote bag, is the organization's logo: an elephant with its trunk raised. The animal evokes the proverbial "elephant in the room" and represents how the subject of mental illness is everywhere but is too seldom discussed.

The women had 800 bags with the logo produced and distributed online. Within four months, they had sold out. (T-shirts and mini-pouches are still for sale on the TDP website.)

The organization wants to keep making limited-edition products, such as a new bag that will be available at the end of March. The revamped TDP website, set to launch in April, plans to feature two stories a week and an archive for older "Voices" stories.

TDP currently donates to centres including the Hospital for Sick Children, Baycrest, Progress Place and Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto. As the company grows, the founders say they hope to add more affiliate charities outside of Toronto. A recent addition was a chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness in New York.

Another new alliance is with Minding Your Mind, a peer-resource program aimed to help high school and college-age students. For Kassie, university campuses are a big area of concern. She says many lack robust resources for students dealing with mental health problems.

"At my alma mater, there were six suicides in one academic year last year," Kassie says, adding that it should be imperative for schools to employ more on-site counsellors.

TDP currently has representatives at six Canadian universities working to spread awareness about the initiative with students.

In recent months, the stories from the "Voices" section have mainly come from Toronto youths and young adults. The next step is to expand to more places and reach more audiences.

"We'd like to receive more voices from different cultures, backgrounds and genders," Bennie says, noting the stories are usually from young women.

Another goal: turn this initiative into a sustainable for-profit that does good for society.

The three founders laud Bell Canada's Let's Talk Day, which also works toward shattering the stigma around mental health.

Still, they insist more needs to be done to provide resources to those in need. A page from the website claims that nearly two-thirds of people with a mental disorder will never seek help from a mental professional.

"Our long-term mission is to be the go-to place for when people are feeling alone or feeling down," Kassie says. ■

Deliberate Steps, Deliberate Medicine:

Tread Carefully When Treating the Elderly

At the age of 100, my elderly aunt was intuitively aware of her declining strength. She had neither the energy nor ability to move back and forth across her apartment purposelessly. By necessity there was an economy of movement and her steps, when taken, were cautious and deliberate.

Watching my aunt helped define my approach as a doctor who works with the elderly. Medical treatments are often reflexive to medical diagnoses, but with elderly individuals in particular, physicians should be as cautious and deliberate with their decisions as my aunt was with her steps, with an implicit recognition of their frailty. Treatments should be cautious in that as a general rule of thumb the potential benefits of treatments diminish with age, while the potential harms increase. Treatments should be deliberate in that they focus on achieving stated patient goals. There is no purpose, for example, in treating a patient who is concerned primarily with maintaining quality of life with a medication that will likely diminish quality of life but offers a chance to improve longevity.

Many individuals with dementia have depleted physical, mental and emotional reservoirs, but unlike my aunt they are not intuitively aware of that frailty. Our job, as the healthcare professionals and families caring for these individuals is to recognize that frailty, work within its constraints and make cautious and deliberate medical decisions that advance the goals of our patients and loved ones.

Pursue conflicts constructively instead of intimidating artists

Evelyn Tauben

The controversy around Israeli artist Achinoam Nini's (Noa) upcoming performance at Vancouver's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations is but the latest in a collection of knee-jerk reactions to left-wing politics where conservative fury foments around one particular artist or artistic project. By now the response is boilerplate.

Prompted by the ire of even a single donor, an organization declares the artist persona non grata and raises a ruckus, drawing great attention to the cause at issue. Rarely (and gratefully) is the artistic expression ever quashed; rather it usually finds an outlet, now championed as a wronged underdog. Indeed, for Noa, the show will go on despite having been vociferously maligned.

Factions on the far left equally call for artists to be uninvited to present in Canada and for the annulment of artistic projects. (Recall the 2009 rancorous TIFF focus on Tel Aviv.) At one end of the spectrum are boycotts, divestments and sanctions, and at the other end are disassociations, cancellations and withdrawal of funds. Each side aims to shut down creative expression and the free flow of ideas. While some art indeed crosses the line, "the line" is increasingly becoming a vast gulf.

Meanwhile, Jewish tradition offers a generative problem-solving model. The concept of machloket l'shem shamayim, literally "an argument for the sake of heaven," promotes a constructive path for disagreements.

Heading up the Jewish Council for Public Affairs' national civility campaign, Melissa Weintraub explains: "Building machloket l'shem shamayim [is] about creating institutional infrastructure for speaking openly about charged topics, naming and exploring our differences honestly, and doing so without attacking, dismissing or caricaturing each other. It's about teaching our stakeholders and constituents to passionately pursue a thorough understanding of those who disagree with them in order to expand and clarify their own thinking and release learning, creativity and fresh ideas."

With Passover approaching, the metaphor of the four sons comes to mind. There are Jews who are absolutely convinced that they are the Chacham – the one imbued with true wisdom and insight. Those self-appointed wise ones insist that those who oppose them are the Rasha – no good, even evil, and intent on harm. In actuality, I think our situation is degrading rapidly to where the Tam, the simple one, is dominating the dialogue: simple solutions, simple rationale. However, the topics affecting the Jewish world (including but not limited to the situation in Israel) are far from simple, requiring nuanced thinking and multi-pronged strategies. If anything, artists can lead the way into the heart of the complexity.

Even more disconcerting than the ascendancy of the small-minded simple one is the proliferation of She'eyno yodeya lishol – the one who does not know to ask, the one who does not know to ask for more information or clarification. The one who does not know to question one's own biases or to unpack a decision driven by feelings rather than clear thinking. The one who does not know how to ask with keen interest for the other's perspective or evaluate the context of an action. The one who does not know how to listen deeply.

Rabbi Joel Alter of the Jewish Theological Seminary speaks of the Torah of Listening: "Listening means fully recognizing the reality of the person with whom one is in encounter. It means seeing and affirming the other's experience. It means granting that the other knows what they know for good reason, even if you know differently from your own experience."

A healthy, vibrant community does not invent evildoers, does not settle for simplistic and uninformed thinking, does not remain complacent about asking hard questions of itself and others. Rather it nurtures wisdom and creativity, approaching conflicts in a constructive manner.

Artists must not be pressured into safe stances by having their parnassah (livelihood) and their reputations threatened. Great artists spark debate. A community without lively debate and quality arts is not truly a live community. Artists are not the enemy. Simple thinking is.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Women play front and centre in new Bible series

AMY GRIEF

Debbi Levin, left, plays Rachel and Lital Luzon as Leah.

Filmmaker Igal Hecht knows men are the focal point of the Torah. That's one of the reasons he set out to make Daughters of Eve, a new docudrama series, which centres on extraordinary women from both the Jewish and Christian scriptures.

Take the story of Abraham and Sarah, for instance, notes Hecht while discussing his upcoming project. "Abraham is usually in the forefront," he says. "But really the story is about these two women [Sarah and Hagar] and Abraham should be taking the backseat."

Fittingly, each Daughter of Eve episode will follow at least one female character. Rachel and Leah get an episode, as do Deborah, Ruth and Naomi as well as Mary Magdalene and Mary, the mother of Jesus.

"The majority of the women are from the Old Testament," says Hecht. "But also, we wanted to incorporate women from the New Testament. So the show is really accessible and reaches out to people of all faiths."

Hecht first started pitching Daughters of Eve back in 2011. He'd read a few books about the topic, but couldn't think of a program that specifically focused on the Bible from a woman's perspective. He thought it would make a great project, and so did Yes TV, who picked it up two years later. Now, it'll finally premiere at the end of the month.

The series features commentary from notable Bible historians, such as Hebrew University professor emeritus Yair Zakovitch, as well as dramatic re-enactments.

"We brought the Bible to life in Israel," says Hecht, who moved to Canada from Israel about 30 years ago. Besides spending a few months shooting scenes in Alberta, he and his crew filmed most of the series in the Holy Land along with a huge cast of actors as well as sheep and camels.

They traveled to 11 different locations across Israel, including Nazareth, Jerusalem and to areas near the Negev Desert.

"Our crew sort of reflected the area," says Hecht. "We had Muslims, we had Christians, we had Jews working together on this program, which was really wonderful." Though, Hecht says he wasn't trying to make a political statement; he just wanted to work with the best local crew he could find.

Yet, much of Hecht's earlier films do focus on politics. That's not altogether surprising considering in 1999 he started a company called Chutzpa Productions through which he's released a wide body of work. Many of these films, like A Universal Language and My Flag, focus on both Jewish and Israeli themes.

Daughters of Eve, however, isn't under the Chutzpa banner. Rather, Hecht and Mike Wright produced it, while Keran Rees directed the entire series.

Along with producing, Hecht plays a rather central part in the Rachel and Leah episode. Since he had a long hair and a beard, he jumped in to play Laban. And he's not the only Canadian talent on-screen. In the Mary Magdalene episode, Toronto-based actor Mishka Balilty takes on the title role.

And it's the women that drive the Daughters of Eve series – that's the message Hecht hopes viewers take away from it. "It baffles me why they're always taking a backseat to the men," says Hecht. "And I think that really stuck out in every story that we explored, how powerful and how strong these women were." ■

Daughters of Eve premieres on Yes TV on March 27. www.yestv.com.

Wearing costumes allows us to express ourselves freely

Laura Goldfarb

In Grade 1, I came to school one day sporting a mauve pleated skirt, a bold floral patterned blouse and a matching lilac-coloured cardigan that was detailed along its collar with thick purple fur. How proud I felt to be wearing the most stylish formal wear of 2004. I strode confidently into class expecting to see my classmates equally kitted out in their special outfits for picture day.

To my horror, only T-shirts and sweatpants met my gaze. As I stood frozen in the doorway, the giant purple rose perched atop my head fell suddenly to the ground, theatrically increasing my swell of humiliation. The classroom hummed with whispers and giggles as my peers grinned and nudged their friends to take note of the striking purple spectacle standing in the doorway like an absurd carnival statue.

Needless to say, it was not picture day.

I knelt quickly to retrieve my shameful accessory, leaving my dignity where it had fallen, and bolted to the bathroom where I burst into tears. It wasn't that I was embarrassed by my outfit, although, in retrospect I should have been. Ironically, it was that, fully dressed in my audacious picture day outfit, I felt exposed, naked even. My peers' piercing stares said: "You're wearing the wrong thing," and this stripped me completely. I wished deeply for a disguise, some sort of lucky cloak that would shield me from judgment.

Whether my later fetishes were caused by this incident or not, I can't say, but subsequently I did develop a special fondness for costumes. I enjoyed making a spectacle of myself on purpose. That way, I wouldn't do it by accident. Costumes provided a cover under which I felt happy and comfortable.

On a whim, when I was 12, my friend and I signed up to perform a bizarre comedic routine for a talent show at summer camp. As the sun went down that evening and we waited for the recital, our apprehension descended heavily upon us. We feared the stares. We feared the judgment. I fretted that I would transform back into that big purple freak as soon as I stepped onto the stage.

Attempting to alleviate our anxiety, we began playfully to apply makeup to each other's face. At first it was just to occupy our trembling hands. But it became amusing, and we started piling on more and more: green lipstick, indigo eye shadow, auburn eyebrow pencil, bright red blush. We pinned up our hair up in preposterous Cirque du Soleil curls, and swathed ourselves in layers of outlandish neon and animal prints. When it was finally time to report on stage and perform our act, we were armoured in absurdity.

We felt that our makeup and costumes were going to protect us. Our disguises would deflect judgment away from us. We felt immunized. The daring boldness of our ensembles had seeped into our skin, and when it was time for the show, we pranced about the stage, shamelessly exposing our inner weirdness to the world. We were wearing the wrong thing and we were a spectacle, but this time, it was of our own making.

A group of children dress up and wear makeup. Laura Goldfarb says Purim is a day to celebrate ourselves unapologetically and be proud of who we are. CJN FILE PHOTO

> We were wearing the wrong thing and we were a spectacle, but this time, it was of our own making.

Anecdotally over time, I noticed that this magical spell cast by costumes was actually quite universal. This was always most evident on Purim.

My school was always fantastically enlivened on the holiday of Purim. Dressed up as other people and things, my classmates were always more vibrantly themselves on the 14th of Adar. The loud kids were louder, their already bold personalities further emboldened by their outfits. The quiet kids were unabashedly expressive from within the safety of their costumes as they enthusiastically contributed their voices to Hawah Narishah.

My school's Purim experience, however, went beyond lavish costumes and unparalleled energy – it was also marked by the school's annual talent show. I had always found this vaguely paradoxical: the day on which the students were encouraged to disguise themselves was also the day on which they were invited to expose themselves on stage.

I remember watching from the audience as one soft-spoken friend of mine emerged on stage, almost unrecognizable as an oversized Teletubby, and sang an original song. I thought, how strange for her to be revealing such an intimate part of herself while concealing all the rest.

I think that I now understand why my school scheduled talent shows on Purim every year, and why it is customary to disguise ourselves on the very holiday that celebrates the unmasking of our true identity.

Costumes give us the courage to express ourselves without fear of judgment. Esther, who was merely a modest villager, didn't identify with the luxurious lifestyle of the royals. She only put on that crown to save her people from annihilation. Royalty was her costume, and only from within it was she safe to expose her true self and innermost wishes.

So on Purim, we, too, wear costumes, and, just as it was for Esther, our costumes instil in us a sense of safety to express ourselves. Purim is a commemoration of heroic actions and miraculous events that took place 2,500 years ago, but it's also the one day a year that, as Jews, we gather with enthusiasm, dressed in ostentatious costumes, to flaunt our peoplehood. It's a day to celebrate ourselves unapologetically, to assert our personal identities without reservation, and be proud of who we truly are. ■

Book delves into the warped mind of Adolf Hitler

CELINE KESSLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Yale history professor, Timothy Snyder, has written not just another book on the Holocaust, he has instead, delved into the warped mind of Adolf Hitler and concluded that Hitler was not just an "Uber" anti-Semite who hated Jews but a "racial anarchist" who considered Jews a "pestilence" infecting the entire planet and distorting its natural order.

According to Snyder, Hitler admired Darwin's "survival of the fittest" theory, and to him the German "race" was the fittest and thus most likely to be the winner in any contest to inherit the largest portion of the earth and be its "natural" rulers. To Hitler's ecological view, the universe was a brutal place designed by nature where the strongest species took by force what they wanted or needed and where the weak, were destroyed. Hitler, according to Snyder, thought of people simply as animals not human beings .

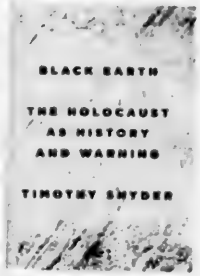
"There is, in fact no way of thinking about the world, says Hitler, which allows us to see human beings as human beings. These ideas which allow us to see each other as human beings.....come from the Jews," Snyder writes.

In Hitler's mind, the only opportunity for the world to revert to its natural order – that of brutal racial competition – was to eliminate the Jews. Snyder draws these conclusions from his study of Hitler's Mein Kampf, his manifesto written while he was in prison after World War I.

The Jews' obsessions with morals, human and workers', rights were full of "Communist ideas" and were to Hitler an inconvenience and interfered with his dream of expansion and creation of lebensraum or living space for the German race.

Hitler's wish was to acquire the rich, fertile lands of his neighbours in eastern Europe "the black earth" and turn the Slavs – whom he considered sub-human – into slaves, only too happy to co-operate. The Jews lived in these regions in large numbers and had influence, particularly in Poland, where approximately three million Jews lived rich cultural lives and even participated to some degree in the political sphere; they were in the way and had to be eradicated.

In Hitler's view of the world – his alternate universe – races struggle against each other, kill each other, starve each other to death and try and take land. Hitler did not consider the Jews a race, in fact, he referred to them as unnatural or even supernatural and he suspected that their nefarious influence extended throughout the world.



Black Earth: The Holocaust as history and warning
Timothy Snyder

Tim Dungan Books

Snyder is multilingual and bases his observations on Hitler's original writings as well as other sources not previously explored. Hitler's resentment after Germany's defeat in World War I and his ecological view of the world never changed from these texts. Hitler did not acknowledge nations or states, only race played a role in his mind. In 1938, after he became Chancellor and Fuehrer of Germany during the Great Depression, he planned the invasion of Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union in order to take their lands.

The substitution of local government with anarchy and chaos, deprived Jews in these countries of their rights and citizenship, rendering them stateless and easier to kill. Because eastern Europe was predominately anti-Semitic, Hitler had plenty of collaborators; in addition to anarchy, there was the opportunity for plunder without retribution.

Few Jews were murdered in Germany, they were transported and killed in Belarus, according to Snyder. In Denmark where the government remained functioning, fewer Jews were murdered because the Danes refused to comply. In Estonia which was invaded by the Soviets and then by the Germans and chaos ruled, mass murder of Jews reached almost 99 per cent. Where anarchy reigned supreme, the Final Solution was most effective, Snyder notes.

In a chilling conclusion, Snyder worries that present world conditions – climate change, rising anti-Semitism in Europe and North Africa, wars in the Middle East, the Russian invasion of Ukraine, and drought and hunger in many regions, create the fertile ground, once again, to scapegoat Jews and bring destruction and ruin upon them. ■

For each recipe, there is information on the restaurant, a large introduction and photo or photos, ingredients, instructions, tidbits or hints for the home cook and sometimes comments from the chef.

This is a great gift for someone who likes to try new recipes .

Artichokes, Roman style

From Tevere 84, Upper East Side, New York

- ❑ 6 medium or 2 lb. baby artichokes
- ❑ juice of 1 lemon
- ❑ 1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ additional oil for frying
- ❑ 12 minced garlic cloves
- ❑ sea salt

Cut off the top of each artichoke just above the middle. Remove some of the outer leaves and the interior immature and hair-like leaves.

Using a peeler, peel the stems of each artichoke. In a bowl, toss artichokes with lemon juice.

Heat olive oil in a large sauté pan over medium heat. Add garlic. Add artichokes and sprinkle with sea salt. Cook, side by side, stem side up, until artichokes are tender, turning several times for overall browning, 15-20 minutes. Using a wooden spoon, press each artichoke firmly to the bottom of the pan so that the leaves flatten out.

Cook for 10 minutes. (Optionally, for very soft and hot artichokes, you can also transfer to oven and bake at 400 for an additional 10 minutes.)

Before serving, heat additional oil in a sauté pan. Flatten artichokes to the flower shape and fry for 2-4 minutes before serving.

High school basketball player focuses on success

JACK BORENSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Haley Perlmutter's multiple basketball team championships are a testament to her leadership skills and desire to excel every time she takes the court.

Her early activities also helped the 17-year-old Newmarket, Ont., resident. She was a competitive dancer for many years, and "the flexibility dance provided my legs, has especially helped my basketball efforts," she said

Her basketball career began in the York North Basketball Association (YNBA) in 2007, where she quickly progressed to rep level with her team, Avengers.

"Avengers [also] played in U.S. tournaments," Perlmutter said. "We ranked top five every year in Ontario."

In May 2014, Avengers captured their first-ever YNBA Division 1 gold medal, at Ontario Basketball's Ontario Cup in London, Ont., in the girls midget (under 15) category after the team's 43-0 season.

In May 2015, Avengers won another gold medal. "To play with eight original teammates and share the victory with them meant a lot to me," she recalled.

She also plays with the Newmarket High School Raiders. "Making the senior girls in Grade 9 and winning my first YRAA [York Region Athletic Association] title was special, and I learned a lot from my Grade 12 teammates," she said.

Perlmutter had four games with 20 or more points in 2014, an accomplishment she has repeated several times.

Raiders won a fourth consecutive YRAA title last November, with Perlmutter scoring 20 points in the championship game. That 2015 breakout season included six games of 20 points or more. She was named to the YRAA girls high school all-star team by Tier 1 senior head coaches.

Perlmutter gained more confidence about her role on the Raiders in grades 10 and 11, "especially playing with four Avengers teammates. The recent championship made it four consecutive, and next year, we want that fifth straight title," she said.

Last summer, Avengers played at Nike National tournaments in Chicago and Washington, D.C., where there were over 500 teams on 60 courts.

"The competitive level being very high pushed not only my team, but me, to step up," Perlmutter said. "We had to play smart and hustle... When opposing teams put tough defenders on me, it pushed me out of my comfort zone, but I continued as I would in any other game."

Haley Perlmutter

Perlmutter started as a shooting guard, "and I have learned over the years to make more passes and get my teams to work together as a unit. My main strengths are playing hard, keeping my energy level up, being aware and maintaining a positive attitude, no matter what the situation."

Her father and coach, Gad Perlmutter, enjoys a close relationship with his daughter, but family connections are set aside when he coaches Raiders and Avengers squads.

"My father provides plenty of constructive criticism, telling me to do the little things that can make the difference in a game. Training has always been fun, and he never pressures or makes players nervous... He is supportive of everyone."

Gad is proud of Haley's academic achievements. "She has a 94 per cent course average, and made the principal's honour roll list, a tremendous achievement, given that she studied for exams in December while travelling with Avengers to tournaments."

He also commended Haley's skills, her control of a game and her work ethic. "I've always told her that to be good in anything, you have to put in the time... and at practices, she's first to arrive and last to leave."

Avengers won gold in their first tournament this season (IEM Spartans) in the under-19 category.

"It's great playing with older girls and teams we haven't seen before," she said. "I feel all the training I've been doing to this point has really helped improve my game. I've been seeking input of coaches with many years experience for feedback on how to improve my game. "

Gad said Haley is now "focused on playing with her current team." She looks forward to Avengers returning to the Nike Nationals in Chicago in July. ■

Improv Anyone?

There was raucous laughter from the over 300 guests who came out to see Canadian actor and improvisational comedian Colin Mochrie and friends perform. The evening was a great success, raising the "roof" and $60,000 in support of Shaarei Tefillah, a growing and vibrant dynamic shul community in the heart of Toronto. ■

ASK ELLA

Setting boundaries can improve family dynamics

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

Sometimes I feel like I live in an episode of Everybody Loves Raymond. My mother-in-law has no problem dropping by whenever she likes without any notice.

When she's here, she proceeds to criticize everything I do, especially when it comes to my kids – and she does it "nicely." She did a crappy job raising her own kids, so why would I listen to her advice about mine?

My husband doesn't mind his mother's meddling, but I feel like I'm going to blow. I don't want to create a rift, and she is welcome here, but I would like some rules in place, and I don't know how to tell her. Truth be told, she scares me, and I need her to help out from time to time. Thoughts?

Meddling Mother-in-Law

Your letter has a tone of resentment, and that's never a good place to be when trying to fix a problem. Take a step back, remove the emotion and make a plan. You want to create boundaries, but allow for an inviting, swinging gate.

This is very realistic and achievable.

It sounds like your mother-in-law has passive-aggressive tendencies. She masks her disapproval by cloaking it in a well-meaning, friendly manner. There is no reason for the criticism to escalate to an argument if you handle it properly.

First, she can't and shouldn't be there all the time. It interferes with the harmony in your home. You and your husband must have that discussion and form a united front, which may be the bigger problem. Together, tell her how much you appreciate and love her, but it would be helpful if she would stay away at dinner time, or homework time. Whatever boundaries you create, make them clear. Then follow it with, "You are more than welcome after school. The kids love to be with you." Choose the times that are appropriate, and stick to them. She can only intrude as much as you allow her to. It may be uncomfortable and difficult at first, but if you set parameters and follow them, you will improve the sanctity of your family and take back control. Do it lovingly and with understanding, and listen to her response. She probably had no idea she was creating friction. I'm sure that was not her intention.

Dear Ella,

This is hard for me to discuss, but here goes. I'm overweight and have been struggling ever since I had my second child.

When my husband and I met, I was 18, a baseball player, runner and loved sports. However, over the years, between stress and children, I've gained over 50 lbs. and can't seem to get back on track.

I know, and I struggle with this problem, but it makes it worse when he is constantly reminding me and watching everything I put in my mouth. It's reached the point that I avoid him, because I can see the disapproval in his eyes. How do I get him to understand he has to lay off.

Weighty Issue

Dear Weighty Issue

There are two things going on here: first, your husband's constant nagging about you having to lose weight, and second how you feel about yourself.

Let's start with your husband. He may be concerned about your health, or he may be concerned about how attracted he is to you now. Whatever the reason, he's crossed a line you are uncomfortable with. Your body is your business, and you need to make that very clear to him. You're not stupid. You have eyes and feelings, and he needs to know that this conversation is off limits to him.

Now let's deal with how you feel. No amount of nagging or diet and exercise books are going to make you happy. You have to decide for yourself that you are ready, and when you are, tackle this problem head on. If you choose to make your husband part of the solution, that should be your choice. When you are ready to work on losing weight, you will. Take back control. You'll be glad you did. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca says each of us has a responsibility to help the Jewish Nation
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl visits Berlin, where he connects Purim and the Holocaust
Rabbi Catharine Clark argues that while the Book of Esther may be a farce, it also raises big questions

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

As we read the latest news in Israel, we see the current situation isn't getting any better. Numerous recent attacks have left people dead and injured.

The question I often ask myself is how am I reacting when I hear about these tragedies? Am I becoming desensitized to them? If so, what can I do to restore my sensitivity?

Mordechai, one of the main characters in the Purim story, sheds some light on the question. When Mordechai realizes the Jewish People are in danger, he steps up to the plate. Esther also realizes the graveness of the situation and goes to the king's palace uninvited, an action that puts her life in danger. These great heroes took responsibility to do whatever they could to save the Jewish nation.

The Torah (Exodus 28:12) commands Aaron, the kohen gadol, to wear shoulder straps containing two stones with six tribal names on each of the stones. The kohen gadol was supposed to walk with those straps in order to constantly feel the responsibility he had toward each member of Klal Israel.

As Jews, we must try to reach this level of responsibility by finding ways of always being aware of the grave situation in Israel.

The Talmud (Sanhedrin 27b) teaches that Jews are guarantors for each other. Rabbi Shimon Bar Yohai (Vayikra Raba 4) gives an example of a group of people in a boat and one of them drills a hole in it. When the others protest, he dismisses them by saying he is drilling in his own spot, not realizing that by doing so, everyone will drown.

As the Jewish nation, we're all in the same boat. When one Jew is wounded, all Jews are hurt. Let us all take this teaching deep into our thoughts and actions.

May the words of the Megillah (8:15), "The Jews had light and gladness, and joy and honour," be fulfilled speedily in our days. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

A recent visit to Berlin and an immersion in the culture of memory that characterizes German life reminded me of Purim. According to Megillat Esther, after the tremendous reversal of events, Mordechai sent a letter directing Jews to annually mark Adar 14 and 15 as "days on which the Jews obtained relief from their enemies and the month which for them was reversed from sorrow to gladness and from mourning to festive day."

Although we were still not sovereign (which is why we don't recite Hallel), the message of Mordechai and rabbis that followed him was that having heard the decree of destruction and death, we must "add joy" to the month of Adar. In the face of ongoing national vulnerability, we must (as Israelis say) "make life."

In Berlin, at the Holocaust Memorial and Information Centre, as well as in the Topography of Terror, I was struck by how, in their initial years, the Nazis would subject political opponents and Jews to public humiliation. They led them through crowds, announcing that this is what is done to those who disagree or are despised. The contrast with Mordechai's monarch-like horse-backed procession through Shushan was clear.

The Nazis not only made the killing of Jews their mission, they also sought to subvert the Jewish calendar as a means of further humiliating our people. They often scheduled deportations or killing actions for our sacred days. For example, in Brezhany, my mother's town, there were deportations on Yom Kippur and Chanukah, with the final aktion on Shavuot night.

After key German leaders were sentenced to death by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, the Nazi propagandist, Julius Stretcher, shouted at his hanging, "Purim Festival, 1946!" linking the reversal of Nazi plans to our deliverance from Haman. While we still have our enemies and must be prepared to respond to them, it is important to "add joy " during Adar and to make Purim into a celebration of our enduring life. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

Purim is the best argument for a life-long commitment to the mitzvah of talmud Torah, the commandment to study Torah.

Purim is usually treated as a holiday for children. We dress our toddlers in cute costumes, encourage our tweens to design unique greggers and enlist our teens in the kitchen to make mishloach manot. With such fun for all ages of children, Purim truly is a great holiday for the kids.

But the Megillah that we read each year is not a children's story. The story of Esther as told to children bears little resemblance to the Book of Esther as read with the eyes of an adult.

For instance, my daughter in junior kindergarten thinks that Esther became queen in a beauty pageant. I read Chapter 2 and can see that Esther's year of training under the tutelage of Hegai, a eunuch, prepared her to audition for a harem. Tweens studying for their bar or bat mitzvah love that Mordechai is honoured and that Jews feast at the end of Chapter 8. I read on and wonder at the 75,000 foes of the Jewish People killed throughout the king's provinces.

On some level, the Book of Esther is a farce, but it is a farce that – like any good sacred literature – brings up big issues.

The story of Purim prompts us to consider important questions of gender and power or the desire for revenge and its dangers.

Because a child's education should be age-appropriate, each of us must continue our Jewish educations as adults. Jews who stop learning as soon as their bar or bat mitzvah is over deprive themselves of the opportunity to consider problems that remain relevant today. ■

Leafs scour Jewish hockey world to aid in race to bottom of standings

yankel@dermeshigineh oy

Young players are being drafted with the promise of unlimited Wacky Mac.

The Toronto Maple Leafs continued their youth movement – and soft tank into the Austin Matthews sweepstakes – by signing the entire roster of the Avenue Road Ducks Select minor novice team to professional tryout contracts.

The move dropped the average age of the Leafs – second only to the Winnipeg Jets, who signed a local peewee team recently – to the lowest in the league.

Analysts and hockey insiders were stunned by the Leafs' bold move. They had predicted the local heroes would rely on players from their Toronto Marlies AHL affiliate to ensure they would sink to the bottom of the league.

"The Leafs already have a young team," said noted NHL insider Bob McKenzie. "I was flabbergasted, flummoxed and discombobulated to see the Leafs take this measure, especially considering they're already scraping the league bottom with their current roster."

Under NHL rules, a lottery will be held to determine draft order, with lower-placed teams having a greater chance at the first overall pick, widely assumed to be the 18-year-old Matthews.

Despite its cellar-dwelling status, the Leafs' Marlies call-ups, including the kosher kid, Zach Hyman, played beyond expectations, scoring goals and actually winning games.

Concerned over the Leafs' unexpected success, team GM Lou Lamoriello sent the rest of the roster to the Marlies, "for a conditioning stint" expected to last the rest of the season. With the addition of the Ducks, the Leafs were still left with 10 spots to fill, so the team looked to un-bolster its roster with more Jewish adolescent call-ups.

With hot chocolate and kosher Wacky Mac dinners before games as an enticement, JCC Chai Sports provided an addition six skaters to the teams.

Robbins Academy, Bialik, Leo Baeck and Associated provided two more each, on condition that Hockey Night in Canada games begin after sunset on Saturday and after assistant coach Jacques Lemaire performs a Havdalah service. Eitz Chaim turned down the request for a player when the Leafs could not agree to its condition that coach Mike Babcock would deliver a dvar Torah at each practice and before games.

"What's a dvar Torah?," asked the 73-year-old Lamoriello. "Is that some kind of fancy new analytics? What's wrong with good, old-fashioned plus-minus? If it was good enough for Rashi, it's good enough for me."

As analysts digested the implications of the Leafs youth moves, the repercussions became clear, especially as regards the salary system.

Signing so many nine- and 10-year-olds will pay immediate dividends, said Hockey Night in Canada maven Elliotte Friedman. "They will save a ton in salary costs, pushing their payroll to near the salary cap floor.

"But there are added costs associated with the move," Friedman continued. "First of all, the costs of all those snacks and doughnuts with sprinkles add up quickly when you've got hungry youngsters practising and playing. And then you've got to hire all those extra trainers and equipment managers to lace up their skates and make sure they're wearing the right colour uniforms."

Ducks' skills coach Rob "I can't do your thinking for you" Edelbaum was stunned at the news the Leafs had signed the entire 2006 Select team. "I can't even get them to make three lines for drills during morning practice," he lamented. "How are they going to learn the left wing lock and penalty-killing systems?"

Taking a closer look at the Leafs move, Edelbaum reconsidered his criticism and pointed out that the Ducks' systems – or lack thereof – might actually resemble those employed by the Leafs in previous seasons.

"I always thought the Leafs looked like a bunch of kids scrambling around for the puck," he said. "Maybe signing nine-year-olds will make them better."

As the rest of the league learned of the Leafs' bold move, teams took steps to counter it in the race to the bottom. The Edmonton Oilers, familiar with life in the basement, reassigned their NHL squad to their farm team in Kalamazoo and signed a tyke team of seven year olds. Provincial rivals, the Calgary Flames, sent their team to Flint and recruited a group of four-year-olds from the local JCC's "learn to play" program.

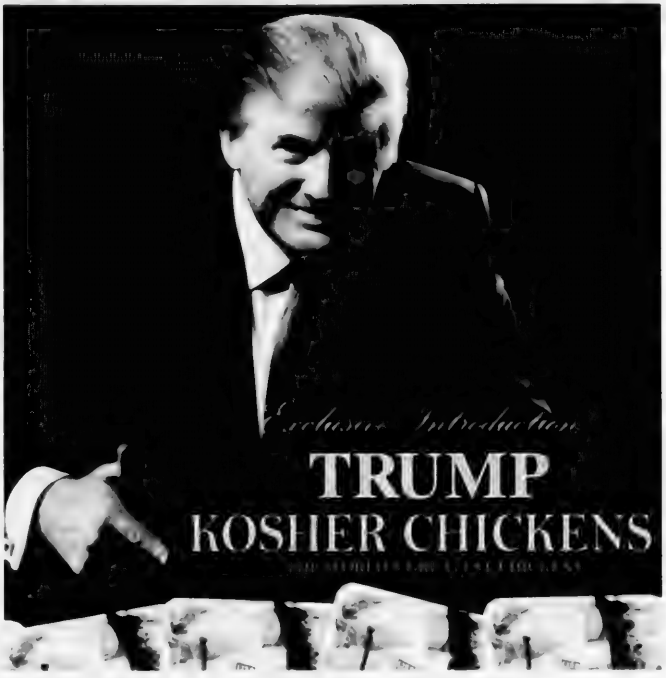
League commissioner Gary Bettman put the whole situation under video review while the NHL Players Association blessed the move, saying the added players will give the union more clout when negotiating milk and cookie breaks during the long, cold, winter season. ■

Donald Trump like you've probably heard him before

SHLOIMI MANDELBAUM
SUPER SPECIAL TO THE CJN

American entrepreneur Donald Trump, front-running candidate for the Republican nomination for president of the United States, has been gaining momentum and picking up delegates on the campaign trail by "telling it like it is."

In an effort to learn more about the man who coined one of the most overused TV catch phrases of the 2000s, a man whose popularity has many in the United States and abroad shaking their heads in utter disbelief, The CJN sat down with Trump, who agreed to take time out his busy schedule for an interview that touched a number of hot-button Canadian Jewish issues and promises to leave some readers more confused than ever.



"Forget steaks. Ivanka says I've got the best polkes." CJN PHOTO ILLUSTRATION

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is often criticized internationally for Israel's security wall. What are your thoughts on the subject?

I will build a great wall – and nobody builds walls better than me, believe me – and I'll build them very inexpensively.

It doesn't do any good to start demeaning the neighbours, because I would love to do something with regard to negotiating peace finally for Israel and for their neighbours. As a negotiator, I cannot do that as well if I'm taking sides. That being said, I am totally pro-Israel.

I shake hands very gladly politically. I don't think you could be a politician if you didn't shake hands.

I think the only difference between me and the other candidates is that I'm more honest and my women are more beautiful.

Even a race to Obama, Hillary Clinton was gonna beat Obama. I don't know who would be worse, I don't know, how could it be worse? But she was going to beat – she was favoured to win – and she got schlonged, she lost, I mean she lost. If Hillary Clinton can't satisfy her husband what makes her think she can satisfy America.

What do you think of the controversy about women taking on Jewish leadership roles in Orthodoxy, including the title rabbi?

Women, you have to treat them like s--t. I do respect them. I have great respect for women. In fact, one of the reasons The Apprentice was such a successful show for so many years, the audience of women was fantastic.

All of the women on The Apprentice flirted with me – consciously or unconsciously. That's to be expected.

I love beautiful women, and beautiful women love me. It has to be both ways. You know, it really doesn't matter what the media write, as long as you've got a young, and beautiful, piece of a--.

I've said if Ivanka weren't my daughter, perhaps I'd be dating her.

You've managed to alienate Muslims, Hispanics, the Chinese, African-Americans, women – what have you got for the Jews?

You are not going to support me even though you know I am the best thing that could happen for Israel. Stupidly, you want to give me money. You're not going to support me because I don't want your money. You want to control your own politicians. I'm a negotiator, like you folks. I promise you that I'm much smarter than Jonathan Leibowitz – I mean Jon Stewart, who, by the way, is totally overrated.

Nailed it.

What do you think of the Jewish National Fund of Canada's decision to withdrawn its support for a Vancouver concert by an Israeli singer who was accused of supporting the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel?

We have to go see Bill Gates and a lot of different people that really understand what's happening. We have to talk to them, maybe in certain areas, closing that Internet up in some way. Somebody will say, "Oh, freedom of speech, freedom of speech." These are foolish people. We have a lot of foolish people.

One of they key problems today is that politics is such a disgrace. Good people don't go into government.

The Jewish religion places great value on humility, as opposed to having too much pride in oneself. What are your thoughts? If you could answer in the third person, that would be amazing.

Do you mind if I sit back a little? Because your breath is very bad.

Oh. Sorry.

Love him or hate him, Donald Trump is a man who is certain about what he wants and sets out to get it, no holds barred. Women find his power almost as much of a turn-on as his money.

People love me. And you know what, I have been very successful. Everybody loves me. I mean, part of the beauty of me is that I'm very rich. I'm worth far too much money. I don't need anybody's money. My IQ is one of the highest – and you all know it! Please don't feel so stupid or insecure. It's not your fault.

We want to see winning. We want to see win, win, win – constant winning. And you'll say – if I'm president,… "Please, Mr. President, we're winning too much. We can't stand it anymore. Can't we have a loss?' And I'll say no, we're going to keep winning, winning, winning… because we're going to make America great again. And you'll say, "OK, Mr. President. OK."

Many North American synagogues are struggling to attract millennials to join their congregations. If you were a Jewish leader, what would you do?

I could stand in the middle of Fifth Avenue and shoot somebody, and I wouldn't lose any voters, OK? It's, like, incredible. 15,000 people showed up to hear me speak. Bigger than anybody and everybody knows it. A beautiful day with incredible people that were wonderful, great Americans, I will tell you. John McCain goes, "Oh, boy. Trump makes my job difficult. He had 15,000 crazies show up." Crazies. He called them all crazy. I said, "They weren't crazy. They were great Americans." These people – if you would have seen these people – you – I know what a crazy is. I know all about crazies.

I think that I would be a great uniter. I think that I would have great diplomatic skills. I think that I would be able to get along with people very well. I've had a great success in my life. I think the world would unite if I were the leader of the United States.

It's a well-known fact that your daughter, Ivanka, converted to Judaism. What do you do when you spend Shabbat together?

I'll drink water. Sometimes tomato juice, which I like. Sometimes orange juice, which I like. I'll drink different things. But the Coke or Pepsi boosts you up a little.

Canadian Jews have been facing shortages of kosher chickens and have complained about the quality of poultry imported into the province of Ontario. What's your take on this?

Trump Steaks are the world's greatest steaks, and I mean that in every sense of the word. Trump Steaks are by far the best tasting most flavourful beef you've ever had. Believe me, I understand steaks.

No, chicken. I asked you about kosher chicken.

We do a tremendous steak business … We buy a lot of steaks from different places. I don't want to buy, if I'm in California, I don't want to buy my steaks from New York. We have different suppliers. We sell the steaks – and largely to our hotels and our clubs and things like that. It's a small business. ■

This interview has been edited, condensed, sliced, diced and sautéed for maximum shock value (but not clarity, because this is Trump in his own words).

Purim on the SS Negba

Backstory

YANKEL GLADSTONE

For the Holocaust survivors and North African Jews on the way to Israel aboard the ship Negbah in February 1951, the Purim celebration was significant.

My friend Mischa Cheifetz and I had volunteered to work in Marseille in one of the two large transit camps for Israeli olim. We were both members of the Montreal chapter of Habonim, the Labor Zionist youth movement. Mischa was from a Zionist family that made aliyah. His father was the editor of the Yiddish daily Der Kanader Yiddisher Odler (The Canadian Yiddish Eagle) – while my father, a shoemaker, was anti-religious, and an anti-Zionist Communist.

We were assigned to work with a large group of youngsters from Morocco. Since I was a graduate of the Montreal Yiddisher Lerer seminar, my assignment was to teach Hebrew and to be a youth leader. My French was not perfect but I managed to lead discussions about life on a kibbutz. The North African Jews fascinated me; many of them spoke French and Arabic, while those from Tangiers spoke Spanish. Their Jewish identity was expressed through their faith. The men, women and youths knew the Shabbat prayers by heart. Their melodies were different but very beautiful and easy to learn. I felt a deep kinship with them, in spite of our differences.

Finally the day we all longed for arrived. Representatives from the Jewish Agency in Israel assisted us to board the SS Negbah, which would take us to Israel. We led our youngsters down to the lowest level of the ship, to the dormitories. We dropped our knapsacks on the cots and headed to the upper deck. From Marseille, the Negbah headed to Genoa, Italy, to pick up Holocaust survivors who were living there in Displaced Persons camps. I stood silently and in awe watching the survivors board the ship. I was hoping that my grandfather Zelig Cymerman and perhaps someone from his large family would be among them. This in spite of the fact that I already knew they were murdered in Treblinka in November 1942.

> There is not a Purim that goes by that I do not recall the joy, the enthusiasm, the excitement I experienced on that wonderful day.

Many of the youngsters were seasick during the first night. With the help of the ship's nurse and two crew members, we brought them to the deck. Some of the first-class passengers helped us organize showers and laundry in their own cabins.

Four days into the 10-day trip to Haifa, we began work on a Purim program. First, we discussed the Purim story and the problem of anti-Semitism. Some in the group knew about the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal. They were familiar with the Ladino language that their grandparents and some parents spoke. A few of the boys told me they learned Torah in Hebrew, which the teacher translated in Ladino. A few tourists helped us create costumes, while some kind African women lent the girls beads and bracelets.

Nature was good to us the day of the Purim performance. The Mediterranean Sea was calm and the sky was blue. The Purim characters in their colourful robes and crowns looked as if they just arrived from Shushan. Everyone was in a festive mood. Mischa and Sarah, the English volunteer, and a committee of adults arranged for refreshments to be served. It was a smashing performance. The captain who was present invited us to perform again in the main first class hall for the tourist passengers.

This happened more than half a century ago, yet there is not a Purim that goes by that I do not recall the joy, the enthusiasm, the excitement I experienced on that wonderful day. I think of my friend Mischa, who has since died, and all the others with whom I worked in Marseille and on the Negbah. They all enriched my life forever. ■

Maria and the Tefillin

ANDREA NATHANSON, RN
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR,
QUALICARE – FAMILY HOMECARE

I love sharing real life stories from my work and here's one of my favourites. It shows how we can make a difference in families' lives.

Max was a successful lawyer who was enjoying a comfortable retired life until he started experiencing physical and mental declines. He was clear he did not want to leave his home of 60 years nor did he feel he could accept caregivers living in his home for the rest of his life.

His children contacted us to help them solve this problem. We brainstormed with them and came up with a plan that could be appealing to Dad. The key was to present it in bite-size pieces that wouldn't stress him.

We then brought in two 'personal assistants' – Maria and Evangelina – and presented them as an option to help him get through the upcoming winter – his 'Winter Plan'. Max accepted this since "it would only be for a few months." The most important goal for the assistants was to allow Max to maintain his routine.

Part of this routine was going to shul each morning. This had not been possible for the past six months, as driving had become an issue. As well, Max felt uncomfortable, because he was no longer able to put on his tefillin without help.

Max was reluctant to ask Maria to get up at 5 a.m. to take him to shul, but Maria thrived on doing any activities with Max that made him happy. Moreover, she started working on getting her G2 license so she could drive him.

Maria also learned how to help Max put on his tefillin each morning, with the rabbi's blessing and guidance. Shul attendance made him feel on top of the world in part because, by making the minyan, he enabled others to say Kaddish.

Max has thrived with his two 'angels' in his life and with the 'winter plan' that was custom-designed just for him. There is now no talk of Max's angels ever leaving him.

When we honoured Maria and Evangelina at our Caregivers of the Month luncheon at Qualicare corporate headquarters in North York, Max and his children came to show their gratitude to his nurse manager Helga and the two ladies who had entered his home and made him feel happy and safe there. Here is what one of the children wrote:

Qualicare® FAMILY HOMECARE

A year ago, I cried and had to take deep breaths as I drove away, worried, wondering if my Dad would be okay until the next time I saw him.

Today I drive away in peace, reassured that he is in safe hands and under watchful, caring and loving eyes.

A year ago I held my breath when I saw my dad climb up or down the stairs and at the thought of him using his marble Jacuzzi to bathe.

Today I don't even think twice as I know his angels are with him every step of the way.

A year ago I started to get middle of the night phone calls that scared me or caused immense frustration.

Today I get good night phone calls and it is usually me who initiates them.

A year ago I truly was in fear almost every minute of the day.

Today I know that everything is in place; my mind is at peace.

Maria and Evangelina....you are not just Dad's Angels.

You are our angels as well.

I feel extremely blessed to be able to help families across North America with our healthcare consultation services and homecare co-ordination. ■

Pints!* Pub is just one of the many great places to enjoy gourmet dining at V!VA Thornhill Woods.

A delicious approach to retirement living

There has long been a stigma attached to the meals served in retirement communities: the food is bland, unhealthy or looks less than appetizing. V!VA Retirement Communities is out to change that, and is committed to providing its Community Members with a nutritious, flavourful and truly appetizing dining experience. They call this approach to fine dining V!VA*licious*.

At V!VA Thornhill Woods, one of Vaughan's newest retirement communities, executive chef Mitchell Lash brings the V!VA*licious* concept to life.

"When you're eating well, you're living well," Lash says.

Lash began his culinary career in high-end restaurants and hotels. After gaining invaluable experience, he decided to start a new adventure in the senior housing sector. This was a pivotal moment in his career, where he has adopted the philosophy that "Age doesn't matter. Young or old, you can enjoy the finer things in life – that includes fantastic food!"

Preparing three healthy meals daily for the same clientele presents its own challenges, especially when incorporating Jewish cultural cuisine into the menu.

"Like any cuisine steeped in tradition, a lot of dishes call for ingredients and ways of cooking that we now know are not that healthy" says Lash. "I really enjoy the opportunity to cook the Jewish cuisine that our Community Members prefer, while finding ways to make the food healthier and still delicious."

V!VA Thornhill Woods incorporates a five week rotational menu that celebrates the changing of the seasons and Jewish holidays.

For example, Shabbat dinner is offered every Friday evening, and meals are suited to celebrations throughout the year, including Passover, Sukkot, Chanukah and others.

"Our commitment to good eating goes beyond Jewish cuisine and healthier ingredients," continues Lash. "All V!VA locations include a Victory Garden where our Community Members and culinary team members plant their own vegetables and herbs. Throughout the year, we use those ingredients directly in our meals. It doesn't get more local or organic than that!"

In addition, the culinary team provides access to the nutritional information of each recipe to Community Members and their families. If a Community Member is following a specific diet, healthier items are identified on the menu, and food allergies and restrictions are accommodated. To complete the dining experience, a lengthy a la carte menu is available, in addition to two Chef Specials at every meal.

What do the Community Members think of the V!VA*licious* experience? Leah Gerofsky has lived at V!VA Thornhill Woods since 2014. She says, "I've loved the food since day one! I enjoy the variety and am always impressed by how fresh and delicious each meal is. There are always so many amazing choices on the menu – I never leave hungry!"

Retirement living doesn't get much more appetizing than that. ■

On the move: Can Pilates be your ticket to staying fit?

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As a Pilates teacher, I'm often asked to define the workout or compare it to other approaches such as yoga. The wordsmith in me likes to begin with the briefest summary possible. The goal of Pilates is really core stabilization, but those two words represent a lot, especially to the aging population. Let's examine what that actually entails.

Stabilization is a combination of flexibility, strength and balance, all areas of key importance as we get older, not just esthetically but functionally. Pilates is ideally suited to address these challenges as it can be weight-bearing but low-impact. Our aim as we age is to stave off osteoporosis, maintain muscle mass, improve posture, boost metabolism and avoid injury. Pilates fits the bill perfectly.

Our core muscles include not just abdominals, but back muscles too – essentially our posture. Actually, there are Pilates exercises to train every muscle from your biceps to your calves, but the goal is to begin with the core, and thereby provide a solid base from which to move effectively.

The workout is named for Joseph Pilates, who developed the regimen to metamorphose himself from a child plagued by ailments such as asthma, into an icon of health and strength. He further refined the exercises to rehabilitate fellow internees during World War I.

Equipment associated with the Pilates routine, such as the Reformer, was originally fashioned after hospital beds with springs on one end and pulleys on the other. Whether you perform Pilates on the mat, on equipment, or employing small apparatus such as balls, the routine is very well suited to an aging population that wants to stay active and mobile.

Increasingly, research points to physical activity as benefiting both body and mind. The concept of mindful movement is based on the interconnection between the two. Essentially, Pilates uses neuromuscular re-training to get your body moving more optimally, whether during athletic activities or daily chores. When your Pilates alignment becomes second nature, you will retain the protective benefit when walking or playing sports.

Much of the repertoire can be modified to suit typical medical restrictions. Seniors may opt for group classes, which are tailored to their needs and offer the increased benefit of social interaction. Alternatively, choose to work one-on-one with a certified instructor who understands your limitations.

You might benefit from rehabilitative Pilates equipment or physiotherapists who are trained in Pilates. There are risks to any exercise program, so best to take a class designed for seniors or work with a specifically educated trainer. Once you've mastered the correct form under careful supervision, you can graduate to a group setting.

There is an increased focus on "taking it off the mat." Often, this refers to holding onto that sense of well-being that comes from meditative focus or releasing endorphins. But it's also the case, that once some of the basic principles of Pilates become second nature, such as the positioning of pelvis, stabilization of shoulder girdle and attention to breath, then the effectiveness of overall movement and hopefully quality of life, will be improved. ■

The importance of caregiving to quality of life

DAVID BERNSTEIN
PRESIDENT, CAREGIVER SERVICES LTD

As we age, most of us want to enjoy retirement in a comfortable, familiar setting – home. Sometimes, however, we need help. Often a family member or loved one can be there. If you've received care you know how critical that support is to your quality of life. If you have been there for a loved one, you know how emotionally exhausting being the provider can be. Sometimes, it's necessary to have assistance from a professional caregiver or personal support worker (PSW). Whoever provides it, caregiving adds tremendous quality to the lives of everyone involved.

Living in a retirement home provides many benefits to help us live independently and get the support we need when necessary. But even in these environments our circumstances change and additional support is needed beyond what the retirement home can provide.

One of the most critical situations we face is hospital stays. Although our healthcare system can provide great care and our family's support is critical, to ensure that we or our loved one is consistently advocated for and engaged often requires additional support. PSWs and caregivers are ideally suited to provide this support as well.

Professional support from a caregiver or PSW can take many forms:

- A three-hour visit, one day a week, for laundry, grocery shopping, companionship, and to drive you to an occasional appointment or for banking.
- A three-hour visit, three days a week in a retirement home to help with exercises, go for a walk or grocery shop.
- A three-hour visit each morning and evening to assist with bathing, toileting, medication reminding, meal preparation and generally getting ready for and closing out the day.
- An eight-hour daily visit to assist with personal care, light housekeeping, meal preparation, medication reminding, and to help with mobility and general safety.
- 12-hour overnight care in a hospital while our loved one recuperates from surgery.
- 12-hour daytime care in a hospital to ensure our loved one is advocated for and engaged when we can't be there.
- 12-hour overnight palliative care to ensure somebody is there at all times, giving family a chance to sleep.
- 24-hour live-in care for when family members travel or vacation.

David Bernstein

> Great caregiving respects and dignifies the lives people have built and lived, and strives to enrich their day-to-day experience wherever possible.

- 24-hour care divided into two, twelve-hour shifts (a day shift and overnight shift) for an individual with significant mobility issues, Alzheimer's or dementia requiring constant monitoring.
- 24-hour live-in care where the overnights are not critical but assistance is needed during the day. Knowing someone is there at night can help give everyone involved peace of mind.

The goal is to understand your needs first and design a schedule with an experienced caregiver or PSW who best fits those needs.

Caregiving is about having the patience and empathy to help people in their most vulnerable states. Great caregiving respects and dignifies the lives people have built and lived, and strives to enrich their day-to-day experience wherever possible. ■

Great food and friendly people
— Ida Holtzkener, Kensington Place Resident

It was the kosher meals that originally attracted Ida Holtzkener to Kensington Place six years ago, but she's come to enjoy much more than the food and on-site Sabbath services. She's met friendly people, and is the official scorekeeper for the Wii bowling program. When she's not spending time knitting, on her computer or reading e-books, she appreciates the convenience of the residence bus for doing errands or taking in the theatre. Her one wish?

"We need a fourth for mahjong!" says Ida. "Besides that I've got no cooking, no cleaning, I've got friends - I'm enjoying my life here."

Retirement and the big black hole

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Matt retired six years ago, it was like watching a train derail in excruciatingly slow motion. A close family friend, he'd spent his whole career in medicine before willingly throwing in the towel at 69. He was "ready to escape all that nonsense," he said, and his plan was to relax and travel with his then-girlfriend.

That plan fell flat when she ended the relationship weeks into his retirement. As he struggled to recover emotionally from the break up, it dawned on me there was no plan B. Retirement, for this man I cared for deeply, loomed like a bottomless black hole. There was nothing to do and days upon days to fill.

In the beginning his kids tried valiantly to compensate for the emptiness of his hours. They invited him for dinners, picked him up for family trips to the lake and called daily, hoping to help him clarify some structure to his week. They suggested seniors' groups where tennis was played, current events were discussed and music was heard. He tried a few before rejecting all of them. "That's for old people," he said often. "I'm too young for that."

SHUTTERSTOCK PHOTO

Truth be told, Matt's retirement would have looked much different had his spouse survived, or had the girlfriend that followed her stuck around. He had an unquenchable thirst to travel and the finances to support it – but once he was alone the prospect of seeing the world no longer tempted him. He scoffed at the idea of joining tour buses filled with seniors, and as the last of his friends had drifted away soon after his wife's death, there was little possibility of finding a friend to go with.

As the years passed the sense of frustration at those empty days eased somewhat. Matt became more accustomed to punctuating his hours with a walk, taking a nap in the afternoon, and filling the in-between periods with shopping trips, bike rides and an occasional visit with his grandchildren. I was relieved to watch a routine set in, one that included puzzles, games of Scrabble and weekly visits to the synagogue.

But he put me off retirement completely. After witnessing his post-career schedule unravel first hand, I vowed to think long and hard before willingly quitting my work days. I wanted nothing to do with that massive chasm of nothingness. I'd watched seniors like Matt move from well-functioning members of society to the ennui of having nothing to do.

They say, you'd never leave your career choice or the quest to find a life partner to chance, so by the same token, why retire without a very clear plan of how you're going to fill your time, and who you'll fill it with? Yet research indicates that many couples leave this discussion out of their conversation entirely, only to find, when the moment arrives, that their views on how they'll spend their Golden Years differ vastly.

To some, the idea of no longer clocking in with the workforce is an oasis in the desert, a place where time will finally be theirs to fully enjoy on the golf course, at the bridge table or lunching with the ladies. But I suspect that for most of us it's a frightening prospect, one we keep at arm's length until its imminent arrival can no longer be ignored. At that point we cobble together a plan, throw in some volunteer hours and check if the kids or grandkids need the kind of help we're willing to offer.

Me, I plan to keep working long after that point has come and gone. As they lower me into the grave you'll hear me shouting from the coffin, "Wait! I still have a deadline to fill!" ■

Brewer pulls 'Border Fence' beer

Bavaria's Roehrl Brewery pulled 2,000 crates of special batch "Border Fence" beer off the market last week after denying far-right sympathies and apologizing for "hurt feelings." CEO Frank Sillner said the name was a comment on Germany's migrant crisis and affirmed Bavarian values. Critics called it "Nazi beer," noting its slogan "the Homeland needs beer," and its 88-cent price, since "88" signifies Heil Hitler in neo-Nazi circles ("H" is the eighth letter of the alphabet). They also cited the beer's Nov. 9 use-by date, the day that marks the Nazi pogroms of Kristallnacht in 1938.

Welcome to Israel, Nate Robinson

Former NBA point guard Nate Robinson got an unusual welcome to Israel after signing with Hapoel Tel Aviv, when a shirtless man on a bike interrupted a TV interview he was doing to challenge him to a game of one-on-one. It turns out Raz Nisim Cohen – who scored five points in six games during the 2012-13 season for Ironi Ashkelon in Israel's second-tier league – similarly baited other pro hoopsters last year, including Hapoel Jerusalem's Donta Smith, whom he bet $5,000 in a vulgarity-laced video. "I beat [ex-NBAer Jordan] Farmar… I beat everyone on Maccabi [Tel Aviv]," Cohen boasted to Robinson. "That's the first time ever somebody's done that," Robinson said. "That's sick. So cool. Fans are great. How can you be mad at that?" From off camera, Cohen added, "Nate, I'll kick your a--, baby," to which Robinson replied, "I'll bust his a--."

Haredi draft dodger busted

The IDF sent a draft notice to a man who had claimed an exemption from military service because he's ultra-Orthodox, after his ex-girlfriend posted a photo on Facebook of them kissing. The post also described a sexual relationship between them, Israel's Channel 10 reported. The army said his request for a deferment based on religious observance – which would include no sexual contact before marriage – was a ruse. The IDF is reportedly considering setting up a cyber unit to investigate haredim who ask for deferments to see if they're actually observant, and to draft them if they're not. ■

Vulnerable need protection

Doctors aren't the only members of the Jewish community who should be concerned about what legislation Parliament will introduce to comply with the Supreme Court decision in Carter vs. Canada ("Doctors wrestle with ethics of 'assisted suicide,'" March 17).

The report recently tabled by the parliamentary committee charged with proposing how to translate the court's decision into law has gone much farther than the Supreme Court, which granted the right to physician-assisted death to a "competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual."

The parliamentary committee proposed expanding the right to competent minors as well as to people with depression. Concerns have been raised by many that without adequate safeguards, people who are vulnerable because of psycho-social factors, such as loneliness or lack of adequate treatment, or motivated to reduce the drain on carers, or coerced by others, may be at risk.

A group of prominent Canadians and organizations, including the Canadian Council of Imams, the Christian Legal Fellowship, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, the Catholic Health Alliance of Canada and the Canadian Society of Palliative Care Physicians, have banded together to propose the Vulnerable Persons Standard to ensure that Canadians requesting assistance from physicians to end their life can do so without jeopardizing the lives of vulnerable persons who may be subject to coercion or abuse.

Where is the Jewish community in this debate? Should we not be among the first to stand up for the vulnerable in our society?

Students don't feel safe

I took great offence to the March 17 article "We feel safe on campus, York and Waterloo students say."

While I cannot speak to the situation at University of Waterloo, I have experienced the anti-Semitic environment at York University first-hand. York is a place where an infamous mural glorifying violence against Israel hangs in the student centre months past its term limit; where the student federation is synonymous with the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement; and where the actions of anti-Israel student activists go virtually unpunished by the administration.

Even at Osgoode Hall Law School, Jewish law students could not hold a bake sale for One Family Fund, supporting both Jewish and Arab victims of terror in Israel, without fomenting backlash and uproar from pro-Palestinian students on campus.

While I would never criticize the important cultural work that Hillel does on campuses across Canada, the political views presented in this article in no way reflect my own experience.

No fan of Tony Kushner

Tony Kushner is a celebrity and a winner of many awards, including a Pulitzer Prize for drama, an Emmy award, two Tony awards, and on and on. There are many people who will want to meet him on his one-night visit to Toronto, but I am not one of them.

We are told Kushner will be discussing how he "tackles the most difficult subjects in contemporary history." Will he be discussing one of his favourite topics: that the creation of the State of Israel was a mistake? Kushner has stated Israel's founding was based on ethnic cleansing, criticized the Israeli army and supported groups that advocate boycotting Israel.

He is a member of the advisory board of the group Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP). Among this group's objectives is an end to U.S. aid for Israel and a call for boycott and divestment campaigns against Israel. JVP uses its Jewish identity to shield the anti-Israel movement from charges of anti-Semitism and to provide it with legitimacy and credibility. It is not a voice for peace. It associates with radical, hateful organizations that seek the end of Israel.

Kushner is certainly entitled to his opinion. But no pro-Israel organization should be a sponsor of his presentation.

RABBI-2-RABBI

The case for 'radical centrism'

Can moderate voices adopt the passion often seen on the political and religious fringes?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: The current election primaries campaigns in the United States dramatically demonstrate the passions of the polarities, with candidates on the political extremes generating extreme emotions, often with scary results.

Of course, extreme positions are not only found in politics, but in religious circles as well, accompanied by intense emotional connection with faith. Those of us who labour in the centre often envy the passion of those further to our right. How do we infuse our moderation with the "hitlahavut," the fiery enthusiasm of those more extreme in their practice, without sacrificing the perspective, the tolerance and the balance that exists in the centre?

Rabbi Finegold: Radical centrism, I like it! We should start a movement. Or maybe just a congregation.

I think you pointed out the paradox already – that the very balance we often seek comes at the price of tempering our passion for fear of losing the balance.

Radicals may be more willing to go for broke because they believe they have nothing to lose. By contrast, the centre has much to lose, since our message is often the first to get lost in the noise. This is the first step toward radical centrism, the articulation of what one stands for.

Polar voices come about when others want to convince the world of the objective truth of their positions. But we need to remember that personal autonomy and balance is not just an anything-goes position, it is about big ideas. It's just that we are not trying to beat people over the head with these ideas. Perhaps we need to remember to beat ourselves over the head and realize that passionate ideas need passionate people.

Rabbi Scheim: I am writing these words in Washington while attending the annual policy conference of The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). Aside from the drama and extensive attention given to the appearance of the major candidates for the U.S. presidency, what is most striking here is the intense passion for Israel expressed by the 18,000-plus people in attendance.

In the case of a large percentage of the Jewish attendees, their passion for Israel likely does not extend to other aspects of Jewish life. Don't get me wrong – I am thrilled by the passion directed toward Israel, and can't begin to describe the excitement of being in a massive arena packed with lovers of Israel. I would just hope that some of that enthusiasm would find its way to core Jewish observance, and to serious Jewish learning as well.

I think you are right, much of the onus falls upon us – upon educators and religious leaders – to model the enthusiasm and the excitement that we want our congregants and our students to acquire. Should we teach Torah as literature, and not as "black fire on white fire," we diminish the power of our sacred texts and tradition to shape lives.

Rabbi Finegold: A colleague of mine, upon witnessing the same AIPAC conference, pointed out that this is the first time that he feels like a "Galut Jew," an outsider to a culture who is tolerated only so long as he votes the right way.

This highlights to me the downside of passion and radicalism. Passionate points of view and passionate leaders often deliberately exclude those who do not share their views and their passions. Donald Trump is a prime example of this. I would even go so far as to say that Trump is a haredi Republican. He is a paragon of isolationism and rejection of those who don't share his radical views.

Thankfully, we in Canada do not have to make a choice regarding such a potential leader. And maybe Canada is the example that radical centrism needs – fierce pride in a shared sense of values while fully respecting, not just tolerating, the multicultural landscape we live in. Let us take the great passion that we can use to inspire and be very mindful of the balance that centrism requires. ■

Putting God first by putting God second

The Talmud in Tractate Shabbat, folio 31a, recounts the story of a man who approached Shammai with a peculiar appeal. "Make me a proselyte, on condition that you teach me the whole Torah while I stand on one foot," he requested. Shammai immediately sent him away. Next, the man approached Hillel, Shammai's famed sparring partner, with the same plea. "What is hateful to you, do not do to your neighbour," Hillel replied, quoting Leviticus. "That is the whole Torah, the rest is commentary. Go and learn it."

That story captures the essence of a new book by Rabbi Donniel Hartman, president of the Shalom Hartman Institute. In Putting God Second: How to Save Religion from Itself, Rabbi Hartman argues that "a life of faith, while obligating moral sensitivity, also very often activates a critical flaw that supports and encourages immoral impulses." He diagnoses this condition as "religion's autoimmune disease."

This disease has two manifestations: "God intoxication," in which "the awareness of living in the presence of the one transcendent God demands an all-consuming attention that can exhaust one's ability to see the needs of other human beings"; and "God manipulation," characterized by a "sinful impulse to control the transcendent" that "extends a blanket exemption from truly seeing anyone outside our religious community."

To be sure, Rabbi Hartman insists that Jewish history and its system of laws offer pointed examples of how to avoid religion's autoimmune disease. He cites Abraham's defence of Sodom, Rebecca, who helped a stranger in need, and Moses' act of generosity to the daughters of Midian, along with the mitzvah of tzedakah (charity) and biblical laws of the shmittah (sabbatical) year as examples of a Judaism focused on human non-indifference.

And yet, despite the lessons of our forefathers and mothers, and despite numerous reminders from the Torah that "faith in God is not meant merely to inspire one to worship but to change those who worship, and to be a force for generating care and concern for all of God's creatures," Judaism's autoimmune disease persists. Rabbi Hartman cites more than a few examples of this malady at work, including what he calls "religiously endorsed injustice" when it comes to the morality of war.

But perhaps the most poignant illustration comes in a discussion of the laws of kilayim – the biblical prohibition against wearing clothes made of a blend of linen and cotton. He quotes the Talmud, Tractate Berachot, folio 19b, wherein the rabbis rule that one is required to strip his clothes off immediately upon learning they contain kilayim, even if the realization occurs in public. This ruling, Rabbi Hartman argues, "presents a model of faithfulness to God whose intent and effect are to blind us from shame, self-interest, social conventions and ethical instincts that might interfere with our unhesitating submission to God's demands."

Rabbi Hartman's thesis – as he puts it, "putting God first by putting God second" – is not necessarily a revelation, but it is an important reminder, especially coming from an Orthodox authority. As Hillel suggests, the Golden Rule is a fundamentally simple idea, but applying it to a religious life requires two feet firmly planted on the ground. ■ — YONI

Scheherazade's antidote to depression

Dan Yashinsky

According to One Thousand and One Nights, Queen Scheherazade would begin telling a story every night, and every night she would stop halfway through. This would have driven her two listeners crazy, except that one of them – her husband, King Shahryar – was already crazy, and the other – her little sister Dunyazad – was all-forgiving and loved stories.

For his part, the king spared the storyteller's life every day because he wanted – he really, really wanted – to know what happened next. He listened as if his very life depended on hearing the whole story. And perhaps it did – for in hearing her tales of kings and peasants, of fortune and destiny, of magic, quests, and lost treasures, he slowly came back to himself. By some mysterious alchemy of art and healing, his psychotic rage abated and his soul found the solace he was so desperately seeking. Scheherazade's form of narrative medicine took 1001 nights' worth of suspenseful, edge-of-your-seat storytelling to mend her listener's broken soul.

Every week, as the storyteller-in-residence at Baycrest Health Sciences in Toronto, I visit the fourth floor. The in-patients are, many of them, being treated for severe depression. When I visit, I bring stories and I listen to theirs.

I recently told them the story of the shirt of the happy man: A king had a son who was so sad that all he did was stare at the wall of his bedroom as he lay in bed. (Many heads nodded at this description. "The bed is your enemy," one patient said to another.) Finally an old wise woman came to the palace and told the king that she knew what could heal his prince. "Go," she said, "and search your kingdom for a happy man. Borrow his shirt. When your son wears the shirt of a happy man, he, too, will remember how to feel happy."

Queen Scheherazade as painted in the 19th century by Sophie Anderson

The king left his sick son and began to wander through the land, searching for a happy man. He asked the captain of the army if he was happy. "Yes, your majesty," he replied. The king asked: "Is there nothing you want?"

"Well, I wouldn't mind being the general."

"Then you're not truly happy as you are," the king responded.

He kept searching. The priest wanted to be a bishop. The merchant wanted to be even richer. He quickly found that nobody was happy with what they had or who they were.

Then one day he came to a forest. Just on the other side of a large hedge, he could hear someone chopping wood and singing a truly joyful song. The king's heart beat faster. He called out: "Who are you?"

"I am a simple woodcutter," came the reply.

"You sound so happy," the king said.

"Yes, stranger, I am happy. My family and I live here in the woods, and we have everything we need."

> As long as we still want to know what happens next, we have a way to discover and share the meaning of our experiences.

"Is there nothing you want?" "No, friend, I am content with the life I am leading."

"Then please help me," the king replied. "I am the king and my son the prince is ill with a terrible melancholy. A wise woman told me that only if he wears the shirt of a happy man will he be cured. Can you lend me your shirt?"

The man on the other side of the hedge didn't answer for a long moment. Then he walked around and stood in front of the king wearing only a ragged coat. "I would like to help you, your majesty, but I cannot. You see, I am so poor that I have no shirt."

And this is where, like Scheherazade, I stopped the story. What, I asked my listeners, do you think happened next? What did the king do?

The group pondered the question at the end of the interrupted story. Slowly, they offered ideas. The king, said one, could lend his shirt to the poor man and borrow it back. Another suggested that the king stayed with the poor woodcutter, met his wife and child, learned how they lived in the forest, and finally took his leave. He returned to the palace, entered his son's bedroom, and sat for a long time on the edge of the bed. Finally, without asking permission, he picked up his frail, silent son. He was surprised by how light the young man had become.

The group agreed that they liked this way of continuing the story. Someone else added: the king carried the prince out to his horse and held him closely as he rode into the forest. When he arrived, he handed him to the woodcutter. Without saying goodbye, the king rode away.

And how did the story end that afternoon on the fourth floor?

According to my wonderfully imaginative Baycrest storytellers, the king came back about a month later. Even from a distance he could hear something that made his heart lift. There were two voices singing a joyful song. And when he met his son and the woodcutter again, neither one of them was wearing a shirt as they worked together in the forest.

Scheherazade teaches us that stories and life run in a close parallel. Even in the depths of illness, the story-listeners on the fourth floor have kept the spark of imagination kindled and alive. As long as we still want to know what happens next, we have a way to discover and share the meaning of our experiences.

We remember that our lives, like a good story, contain sadness and joy, love and loss, and that the important thing is to keep listening, keep wondering what happens next, keep imagining that a future is possible in both stories and real life. That is Scheherazade's antidote to depression. The queen of all storytellers knew well that "story-care" is inseparable from healthcare. ■

A dramatic innovation in the Canada-Israel relationship

From electricity grids in Ontario to Alberta's oil sands, Canadian and Israeli companies are working together in new and creative ways

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Back in the 1970s, science historian James Burke hosted a television series called Connections that looked at how science discoveries in one sphere of life unintentionally and unexpectedly led to breakthroughs in other areas.

As if to add evidence to his thesis, developments in Israel designed for the Iron Dome missile defence system are now being applied to a Canadian electricity grid. And Israeli innovations in water treatment are being tested to determine whether they can apply in reducing waste in the Alberta oil sands.

At the nexus of these collaborations and others stands the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), an organization founded in 1994 by the governments of Canada and Israel to fund joint projects, promote technology development and bring together companies from both jurisdictions.

The oil sands and electric grid collaborations are but two of the organization's success stories, said Henri Rothschild, CIIRDF president. But CIIRDF does more than merely create business relationships. "You build profitable business relations," he said. "You also build profitable human relations."

In Ontario, Ellis Don, a Canadian construction services company, is teaming up with Rafael Advanced Defence Systems, an Israeli high-tech firm responsible for the development of Iron Dome, to use Israeli-designed applications to operate a Guelph-based electricity grid in the most efficient manner possible.

Rafael's "autonomous decision-making" software is adaptable to running a power grid, explained Robert Barnes, director of managed services for Ellis Don, who has been at the focal point of relations between the two companies.

The Iron Dome software that evaluates incoming rocket threats and determines which should be shot down and which should be ignored can be adapted to a civilian use, Barnes said.

Right now, Ellis Don is looking at "the commercial application for [Rafael's] software expertise," said Geoff Smith, the company's president and CEO. That could be applied to make power utilization most efficient and place Ellis Don at the forefront of this developing market, he added.

Ellis Don teamed with Rafael following execution of a memorandum of understanding between the two companies, but it was CIIRDF that acted "like a marriage broker" and brought the two sides together, Barnes said.

In its recently released 2016 Impact Report, CIIRDF focuses on the burgeoning business relationship between Canada and Israel.

Over the course of its history, CIIRDF has funded 110 projects involving more than 200 companies from both countries. It has enabled the joint development, marketing and sales of more than 50 technologically improved new products for global markets and generated $60 million in initial sales and $300 to $500 million in additional economic value. Hundreds of people in both countries owe their jobs to CIIRDF projects.

Rothschild has been instrumental in creating the structure that brings together the two sides in innovative and commercially viable projects.

At a time when "China and India are beating a path to Israel to be partners, Canada has the unique opportunity to seize on opportunities as they arise," he said.

Rothschild suggested that another area on which CIIRDF has focused – promoting the Arab-Israeli business sector in Canada – could bear fruit as well.

Last January, CIIRDF teamed with one of the arms of Israel's National Technology Innovation Authority (NTIA) to bring a delegation of Arab-Israeli industry innovators to Canada to meet with the representatives of Ontario firms. The meeting connected 12 innovative Galilee companies with prospective R&D partner firms from Ontario.

Rothschild believes there is room to grow that part of the Canada-Israel relationship. He has advised Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne, who is scheduled to visit Israel in May, "to go to Nazareth (a largely Arab city in northern Israel) to reach out to the business and greater community, in light of the potential for business and overall relations between Arab-Israeli community and Ontario."

Avi Hasson, Israel's chief scientist and chair of the NTIA, said the Israeli participants in those January meetings reported that "they got very significant business introductions."

Hasson believes that, in particular, there is room to grow the Canada-Israel relationship in resource-related technologies and in medical applications.

> We need to expose the capabilities, interests and gaps of each country to each other
> Avi Hasson, Israel's chief scientist

"We're certainly not experts in oil and gas," he said. "We're without natural resource companies. What we found out at conferences and meetings is that when the needs of those companies are explained, there were a lot of Israeli companies that had the technology applicable to that space."

"No word is more important than collaboration," he said.

From Hasson's perspective, "the last few years have been very successful.

"The companies follow the opportunities. They don't care about the political situation and they respond loud and clear. They recognize the opportunity Canadians and Canadian companies present to them.

"A lot of it is about awareness," Hasson continued. "We need to expose the capabilities, interests and gaps of each country to each other. That's a lot of work and CIIRDF plays right into this."

When it comes to resource development in the Alberta oil sands, provincial legislation sets tough regulatory standards for the industry, including in water use and a reduction in the carbon footprint. That's where Israel comes in, Rothschild said.

Israel is a country that faces a shortage of fresh water, but "adversity brings ingenuity, the need to be on top of your game," and so Israel has developed an expertise in water use, which can be employed in the oil sands, he said.

The Canada Oil Sands Innovation Alliance (COSIA) has been "evaluating Israeli technologies. Last year, Israel was the single biggest source of new technologies in areas such as water purification, monitoring, sensors," Rothschild said.

Tom Reinders is intimately familiar with the Israeli role in technologies that could benefit the oil industry. A technology development engineer at Devon Canada, one of 13 members of COSIA, he's visited Israel to see first hand what technologies might be available for use in the Canadian oil industry.

Acting as a middleman and leveraging its position as an associate member of COSIA, CIIRDF had presented more than 20 Israeli proposals to COSIA for its consideration.

"Of the 20 plus Israeli technology proposals that were submitted to COSIA through CIIRDF, about half a dozen were selected for further evaluation by COSIA member companies." Reinders said.

"Israel's reputation is strong. I would say the perception is that there is a lot of high-tech being developed in Israel. Certainly on the water side, everyone knows the challenge of water, and people know they're leaders in water treatment," he said.

"We want to collaborate and work together to improve environmental performance," he added.

As described in 2016 Impact Report, "the Canada-Israel R&D project aims to improve the operation, service and maintenance capabilities" of parts of the water treatment process, improve safety, reliability and ultimately boost productivity and profitability.

There are many other areas of bilateral co-operation, midwifed by CIIRDF, that are referenced in the report: in wireless technology, wearable technology for athletes, training surgeons, improvements in cardiac imaging devices, satellite data transmission and more.

As far as Rothschild is concerned, the future is bright and going to get brighter.

"The real story, in an age of innovation, is that Israel is a partner of choice for the world, and that is true of Canada," he said.

That collaboration helps both sides in developing current business projects and in opening doors for ventures in Europe, China and the United States, he added. ■

To shame or not to shame?

Yael C.B. Machtinger

Ta'anit Esther, the Fast of Esther, marked International Agunah Day, the purpose of which is to publicize the plight of agunot, "chained" women who are not able to obtain a get, a religious divorce, from their husbands.

The name "Esther" is related to the Hebrew word "hester," meaning hidden. For nine years, Esther guarded the secret of her religious and familial heritage. As the Talmud notes, she "hid her words." The Purim story heroine was thus kept silent.

How does this connect to this International Agunah Day?

Like Esther, the voices of agunot have been hidden and silenced. Consequently, when a mesurevet-get, a woman whose husband has refused to grant her a get, can voice her void, we must embrace it. And while some might find the act of shaming men who withhold gets shameful in and of itself, I contend that any opportunity to empower mesuravot-get and recast the characters, making abusive husbands the object of shame, must be embraced.

"E-shaming," is a constructive, re-imagined, rebooted version of traditional acts taken to shame men who refuse to grant gets. Technology can help remedy instances of get-refusal by exposing abusive husbands as those who should be ashamed. Intensified use of technology in our digital age offers a fresh take on remedying this deep-rooted phenomenon.

E-shaming, a term I coined in relation to the agunah issue, is more beneficial than other grassroots remedies because it cuts across boundaries and networks of affiliation. The critique of traditional cherem, or excommunication, is that abusive husbands can join new communities or synagogues easily, leaving their bad behaviour behind them. The effects of cherem are not as severe or impactful as they were centuries, or even decades, ago when moving was more onerous and expensive and congregations less prevalent. E-shaming, reverses this effect, so that husbands, too, are chained to their choices to chain wives.

Most importantly, this nexus of get refusal and technology enables women to be active participants in navigating complex legal orders, simultaneously challenging the imagery of the passive victims they are portrayed as. Transforming mesuravot-get from passive, helpless victims to active participants in campaigns to exact gets is momentous, not shameful. Social media has become a platform whereby mesuravot-get can recast the mistaken perceptions about them and assert their agency (something we should celebrate as feminists, by the way).

That said, not every agunah would feel comfortable with e-shaming. Individuals must be respected, and public campaigns are not always in everyone's best interests.

However, in Canada, e-shaming could be particularly potent, since no other remedies, including a viable, legal and halachically endorsed prenuptial agreement, have yet to emerge. My objective is to alert the Jewish community to the e-shaming phenomenon and the transformative successes it has been known to produce in challenging dominant perceptions about agunot as weak, passive, submissive victims, and in challenging dominant normative reactions by communities which deny the existence of get-refusal altogether.

E-shaming contributes to the unsilencing and self-narration of mesuravot get, and I welcome giving them a platform from which to tell their stories. Most of the women I have interviewed in the course of my work, including dozens in New York and Toronto, described the shame they feel, having endured abuse and accusations they wronged their families by failing at marriage and disappointing the community and the marriage ideal that the religion propagates. If empowerment can be achieved through e-shaming, that is noteworthy, and we mustn't be ashamed of it. We must use every tool in our toolbox.

Let us not stand idly by, allowing the everyday heroines of our generation to remain hidden, to be silenced as Esther was. Let us reveal the hidden by empowering agunot and their narratives. ■

We must make day school affordable for the middle class

Daniel Held

It's day school tuition season. Across North America, Jewish day school budget committees and boards are reviewing budgets, fine-tuning enrolment projections, and negotiating contracts to arrive at tuition costs for the 2016-17 academic year. It's always been a gruelling process, but in today's day school environment, it's that much more difficult, and that much more pressure lands on the shoulders of these volunteers.

For more than a decade, school tuition has risen at a pace exceeding increases in inflation or median household income. These increases have resulted in day school tuition taking up an increasing portion of the average family's disposable income.

Middle income families – who live just above the threshold for traditional tuition assistance, but struggle to afford the full cost of day school – have been impacted most by these increases. Indeed, we've begun to see a barbell effect in day school enrolment – high market penetration among lower-income families who qualify for and receive tuition assistance, lower market penetration among middle-income families who struggle to afford tuition, and high market penetration among high-income families who can pay full tuition.

In budget committees and around board tables, there are two pressing issues. First, how can we mitigate increases in tuition, reducing annual tuition increases to a point where we can look toward a more stable future? Doing so is critical to the long-term viability of Jewish day schools. If we do not dramatically cut these increases today, the compounded impact in years to come will cripple the day school system – a trend that is already emerging.

Second, how can we make day school affordable for middle-income families? Three years ago, when writing the Greenbook on Day School Affordability and Sustainability for the Avi Chai Foundation and Jewish Funders Network, there was a smattering of middle income programs at schools across North America. As one case in point, at the time, there were fewer than half a dozen schools with iCap programs – programs that cap tuition at a proportion of household income.

In the summer of 2015, when UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education completed a survey of day school pricing models (which can be found on our website at www.cjetoronto.com), we found an astounding range of middle income programs at schools across North America, including more than two dozen schools utilizing iCap.

In Toronto, the Leo Baeck Day School launched Aleph Baeck, a program offering middle income families grants to make it easier to afford tuition. Similarly, Robbins Hebrew Academy, with support from UJA Federation and the Avi Chai Foundation, was one of the first schools to mount an iCap program. In Montreal, the Generations Fund provides subsidies and tuition freezes for middle income families.

Each of these programs has been an audacious pilot, testing the waters and learning what works. Making day school affordable for middle income families is essential to ending the barbell effect, ensuring economic diversity among the student body and securing the long-term sustainability of our schools.

I don't envy those who sit on school budget committees and boards. In the coming weeks, we're sure to hear stories of the difficult deliberations that take place around their tables, stories that are true reflections of the seriousness with which they treat their difficult task. At the same time, we will hear the frustrations of parents, who, once again, will be asked to shoulder an increase in tuition that has not been matched by increases in their paycheques.

If I could offer both committees and parents one piece of unsolicited advice, it's the Einstein quote hanging on the wall of my office: "We cannot solve our problems using the same thinking we used when we created them." Cutting costs, middle income interventions and other new forms of thinking are required to solve today's problems. ■

Would we devour each other without good government?

Jean M. Gerber

Just returned from a visit to our neighbours to the south, my original home and native land. Except that it is no longer my home, less and less like my native land.

There are many things to say about the U.S. elections: some good – more young people involved – and some very, very bad.

Unless you are just back from Mars, you know the tenor of many speeches on television: what passes for platforms are slogans; what passes for debates, obscenities; for dialogue, bombast and boast.

I thought back to my Grade 7 class debate, the year Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower ran against Adlai Stevenson. Our social studies class (then called citizenship) held a debate on the platforms of the respective candidates.

I was the Republican supporting Eisenhower, another classmate the advocate for Stevenson. In the end, I won. So did Ike, although without my help. No surprise there, as Pennsylvania is, and was, a Republican stronghold and Ike a war hero. But we addressed the issues: e.g. Communism, the atom bomb, the welfare of newly de-mobbed soldiers.

Fast forward many years and what have we got? Un-reality TV.

Yes, we are not living in America, but make no mistake. The outcome will affect us all, both as individuals (think border crossings) and as a country (think NAFTA, security, immigration.) More, think of the example this campaign sets to all young people contemplating a political career.

What can be derived from our Judaic heritage to guide us at this fraught moment? The rabbis of Pirkei Avot had some wisdom for us: "Be wary of the government, for they get friendly with a person only for their own convenience. They look like friends when it is to their own benefit, but they do not stand by a person when he is in need." (Pirkei Avot, 2:3)

How well we know this can be true. However, as long as we keep alert, usually in a democracy we can be assured the government will stand by us, and by Israel. It's not the 1930s anymore.

"Pray for the welfare of the government; for if it were not for fear of it, one person would swallow another alive." (Pirkei Avot, 3:2)

This feels acutely relevant. Every week on Shabbat, we pray for the government and the people of Canada, that we may be governed wisely and compassionately. So what kind of government are we praying for? Is it true that without government we would devour each other? Where are those better angels of our nature? What are we losing?

We only have to look at parts of the world where government has ceased to function to see the truth behind this cynical view of humankind. Syria, or what was once Syria. Lebanon and other parts of the Middle East. Afghanistan. Libya. South Sudan and other areas of Africa.

But is any government suitable? Is any old kind of governance preferable to none? Would we actually fall into chaos if our institutions ceased to act on behalf of the people? We only have to remember the Weimar republic to see how a nation can choose poorly in order to survive. Or, for example, Rwanda today, where a saviour has become a tyrant.

Yet what is on offer by my Grand Old Party? Candidates who are racist, xenophobic, and above all, ignorant of the fundamentals of government. Nor has the media distinguished itself in drawing out the vacuity of the campaign.

Indeed, the U.S. government has almost ceased to function, with congressmen openly refusing to do their jobs. When this happens, we have incipient chaos. Soon, perhaps, people will begin swallowing each other.

Yes, every head of state is an imperfect choice. They will do things we dislike, or make policies injurious to the vulnerable. So we need to hope that we have chosen someone who can govern wisely. Right now, that seems an open question down south. ■

Turkey's terror fight comes late, and with blind spots

Paul Michaels

Along with just about every other country in the Middle East, Turkey is going through a period of instability.

So far in 2016, Turkey has been rocked by four major terrorist attacks, including two in Istanbul, both of which have been attributed to ISIS.

One of these, on March 19, left three Israelis and one Iranian dead, and 36 injured, 11 of them Israelis. Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon said that Turkey is "awash in terrorism."

As of this writing, there are unconfirmed reports the suicide bomber, a Turkish national affiliated with ISIS, deliberately targeted the visiting Israelis, following them from their hotel.

If verified, the claim would lend support to what Raphael Green of the Middle East Media Research Institute told the Jerusalem Post: that while war against Israel is not – at least now – a high priority for ISIS, through its official newsletter, Al-Naba, the Islamic State calls on Muslims worldwide, as a matter of religious duty, to support a Palestinian jihad against Israel and to support attacks against Jews wherever they may be.

Meanwhile, as Israel and Turkey lurch toward normalizing relations, Turkish President Recep Erdogan, in a rare gesture, sent Israeli President Reuven Rivlin a letter on March 20 expressing his condolences "to the people of Israel and to the families of Israeli citizens who lost their lives in this treacherous attack."

For someone well known for his bitter hostility toward Israel, and even for his anti-Semitism, Erdogan's words came as a bit of a surprise, but they also reveal the seriousness of the situation he and his country now find themselves in, including hostility with Russia.

According to Israeli media, Dore Gold, director general of the Foreign Ministry, praised the Turkish government for its co-operation. "It's clear that the Turks went above and beyond to coordinate with Israel… We had to transport people over the border without passports, mobilize airplanes and bring the bodies of the dead back to Israel," Gold said.

If there's a positive side to this very sad story, it's the co-operation between Turkey and Israel in this case.

Whether that manifests itself elsewhere in the relationship remains to be seen. There are still difficult issues standing in the way of normalized ties, foremost being Turkey's hosting, in Istanbul, a major faction of Hamas whose goal, among other things, is to establish cells in the West Bank.

In his correspondence with Rivlin, Erdogan emphasized what he termed "the absolute necessity for the international community to conduct a joint, united and determined fight against terrorism," but he refuses to acknowledge that that also includes a fight against Hamas – deemed a terrorist organization by the European Union (EU).

Ironically, following the controversial deal Turkey recently reached with the EU, in which Syrian and other refugees will be considered for immigration to Europe, Erdogan believes Turkey's application for membership in the EU can be expedited, even though, as an increasingly aggressive authoritarian, he violates EU democratic values by jailing journalists and confiscating critical media outlets.

Another irony, which has escaped most western media attention, is that the killing of the Iranian citizen in the Istanbul attack occurred on the very day that Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif was in Istanbul to further solidify ties, mainly economic, with Turkey. Where is the Turkey that once was touted to be the great Sunni counterforce to Shia Iran's incursions into the region, including foremost its sponsorship of terrorism?

Yet not only does Iran fund and arm Hezbollah, which even the Arab League earlier this month designated a terrorist organization, it also reportedly is back to funding Hamas and Islamic Jihad in Gaza. All are dedicated to Israel's destruction.

Were Erdogan not so obsessed with attacking the Kurds (whose only demand is autonomy within Turkey), he might long ago have confronted both Sunni and Shia violent extremism. Now it may be too late. ■

Federation distances itself from controversial playwright

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After "thoughtful consideration" and consultation with its leadership, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has distanced itself from a May 9 event at the Koffler Centre of the Arts – a UJA constituent agency – featuring U.S. playwright Tony Kushner.

In a March 21 statement, the federation noted that Kushner is a member of the advisory board of Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP), "an organization that supports boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel."

Though Kushner "has publicly stated that he does not support the BDS movement, UJA Federation has concerns about [his] association with JVP, and we will not support an event where there is any link to organizations supporting BDS.

"Therefore, we are disassociating ourselves from this particular event involving Mr. Kushner, although we remain strongly supportive of the Koffler Centre of the Arts."

Kushner is perhaps best known for his two-part epic play Angels In America: A Gay Fantasia on National Themes and for screenplays for the Steven Spielberg movies Munich and Lincoln. He's won some two dozen awards, including the Pulitzer Prize, two Tony Awards, an Emmy, and the New York Film Critics Circle Award.

The federation had previously promoted the event on its website, a post that has since been removed. It was also listed as one of the Koffler Centre's institutional supporters in a full-page ad in the March 17 print edition of The CJN.

Tony Kushner

> [I have] never supported a boycott of the State of Israel. I don't believe it will accomplish anything positive

While the UJA logo appears in ads and on websites of affiliated schools and agencies, "UJA was not involved in organizing or approving this particular speaker," Dan Horowitz, the federation's editorial director, told The CJN.

Kushner will discuss how he "tackles the most difficult subjects in contemporary history," and offer his thoughts on the future of contemporary theatre in North America, according to the Koffler Centre's website.

In response to UJA Federation's position, the Koffler Centre said it is "very fortunate that Tony Kushner, one of the world's greatest living playwrights and certainly among the most significant thinkers of our time, has accepted our invitation to visit Toronto for an evening."

Kushner has "publicly and repeatedly stated" that he does not support BDS and "we accept this acknowledgement," said Tiana Koffler Boyman, the centre's co-chair of the board in a statement.

Jewish Voice for Peace, founded in 1996, "proudly endorses the Palestinian civil society call for boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) until Israel abides by international law," its website states.

"We reject the assertion that BDS is inherently anti-Semitic and defend activists who employ the full range of BDS tactics when they are demonized or wrongly accused of anti-Semitism."

The website lists Kushner as a member of JVP's advisory board.

While Kushner has rejected BDS, he supported the Israeli artist boycott of the West Bank settlement of Ariel.

In 2010, 60 leading Israeli actors and playwrights signed a letter stating they would refuse to play in the new theatre in Ariel, one of Israel's largest settlements.

"They are refusing because settlements like Ariel sprawl across Palestinian land occupied by Israel and are illegal under international law," Kushner and Columbia University professor Alisa Solomon wrote in The Nation.

In 2011, City University of New York withdrew an offer to award Kushner an honorary degree because of his views, but later reversed its decision and granted him the degree.

Responding in a letter to the Jewish Week newspaper, Kushner said he has "never supported a boycott of the State of Israel. I don't believe it will accomplish anything positive in terms of resolving the crisis." He said he remains on the advisory board of JVP, "even though I disagree with the organization about a number of issues, including the boycott."

He added that "the historical record shows, incontrovertibly, that the forced removal of Palestinians from their homes as part of the creation of the State of Israel was ethnic cleansing."

He said his "feelings and opinions – my outrage, my grief, my terror, my moments of despair – regarding the ongoing horror in the Middle East, the brunt of which has been born by the Palestinian people, but which has also cost Israelis dearly and which endangers their existence, are shared by many Jews, in Israel, in the U.S. and around the world."

The author said he's "very proud of being Jewish, and discussing this issue publicly has been hard," but he believes his job "is to try to speak and write honestly about what I believe to be true," and that "silence on the part of Jews who have questions is injurious to the life of the Jewish People."

Artists at York promote pro-peace dialogue on Israel

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Always thinking of new ways to promote peaceful dialogue about Israel at York University, Hasbara at York brought graffiti artists to paint pro-Israel murals in the school's central square, much to students' delight.

"Students reacted really positively and were excited to see graffiti artists on campus," said Ariella Daniels, president of Hasbara at York.

"Students from all backgrounds, very diverse, came up and signed the murals and had conversations with us, and it was a beautiful atmosphere to have on campus."

The artists – who go by the monikers Vinny, Pesu and SeeOne – were invited to York for their involvement with Artists 4 Israel. Founded in 2009 as a non-profit initiative to promote artists' rights and the right of Israel to exist in peace and security, the New York-based organization presents the work of non-Jewish artists who create pro-Israel work that's "credible and adaptable to the widest possible audience."

Daniels said despite the recent controversy involving the pro-Palestinian mural hanging in York's student centre – which spurred media mogul Paul Bronfman to pull his support from the university – this event was not organized as a response to it.

"We've wanted to do this for the past two years. Most students and faculty thought that we were challenging the [earlier] mural, but that is not the case. We just want a different way of producing dialogue on campus," she said.

"The idea was that people would walk by and see these graffiti artists in action and it would catch their attention and hopefully start a conversation with students walking around."

Daniels said the program, co-sponsored by StandWithUs Canada, Masa Israel Journey Canada, Size Doesn't Matter, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, was something she wanted to bring to York since she learned about Artists 4 Israel about two years ago.

She said she heard about the group when she was on a Hasbara Fellowships trip in Israel.

Graffiti artist SeeOne paints a mural.

"A couple of my friends from New York mentioned an organization called Artists 4 Israel... that tries to show a different medium for dialogue, and they brought it to university campuses. I thought, 'Oh my gosh, I want to bring this to York because it uses art to bring about dialogue and it's more of a cool way to appeal to students,'" she recalled.

She explained that the organization's artists come from all over the world. Most of them have travelled to Israel, and produced artwork there.

"The idea is that they don't just produce beautiful art, but they also get a chance to engage verbally with other students and talk about how they've been to Israel," Daniels said.

"When I spoke to them on campus, they mentioned that they try to produce artwork that's as unbiased as possible. It's just pro-dialogue and pro-peace. That way, students can participate and engage in more dialogue on campus."

"One of the canvases says: 'Peace for Israel' along with the logo of York University. A bunch of students signed it and wrote messages for peace and dialogue."

Another depicts a lion, which is York's mascot, with the words "peace, unity and love" adorning it.

She said Hasbara at York hasn't made a decision about whether to seek permission to have the murals displayed elsewhere on campus, but in the meantime, the group plans to display them at its own events. ■

Survey of York Region Jews aims to boost engagement

jshupac@thecjn.ca

A large segment of Vaughan's Jewish population can be likened to "swing voters" when it comes to their potential to become more Jewishly engaged, according to a new survey by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Julia & Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education.

A report based on the survey, The Jewishly Engaged of York Region, was published last month. The poll itself was conducted last fall by the Koschitzky Centre in conjunction with American research firm Measuring Success, as well as 50 Jewish partner agencies.

Its purpose, explained the centre's executive director Daniel Held, was to determine how Jewishly involved the Jewish community in Vaughan – which he said "is growing by leaps and bounds" – currently is, how its members might consider becoming more involved, and the barriers that prevent them from doing so.

Based on 4,600 responses, the survey found that "central Vaughan," the portion of the region running along Bathurst Street from Highway 7 north to Major Mackenzie, is an area that Jewish community institutions should target to have the greatest impact on engagement, because it's home to a high proportion of the GTA's young Jewish families.

Central Vaughan is home to many young Jewish families.

Held said Statistics Canada's 2011 National Household Survey showed that the Jewish population of Vaughan more than doubled in the last 20 or so years, from 21,290 in 1991 to 47,135 in 2011, and that as of 2011, 30 per cent of Jewish Torontonians under the age of five live in Vaughan.

The report noted that "southern Vaughan," which runs from Steeles Avenue to Highway 7, already has a "large, established communal infrastructure," including five day schools. Southern Vaughan has "reached saturation and is no longer growing," the report said.

By contrast, between 2001 and 2011, the Jewish population of central Vaughan grew by 614 per cent.

Whereas southern Vaughan has a much higher proportion of Orthodox Jews, central Vaughan respondents reported being less likely to attend High Holiday services or to be synagogue members, though their Jewish activities have increased over the last three years more than their southern Vaughan counterparts.

Held said one striking finding was that in Vaughan overall, even among the most Jewishly engaged, parents of school-age children responded "maybe" far more than "definitely" to questions of whether they would send their kids to Jewish day school, supplementary school, day camp, overnight camp and early childhood education programs.

This finding, which the report dubbed "the opportunity of the maybes," is significant, Held said, and further analysis of the data should shed light on what Jewish agencies can do to reduce obstacles for families.

The centre and the polling firm's researchers will be doing deeper analysis over the next few months and expect to release a more detailed report in May.

"We can look, for example, at all the people who answered 'maybe' to sending their kids to Jewish camp. Then we can look at where they live, their household income, the languages they speak at home and their barriers to entry, to determine the reasons they may or may not send their kids to camp," Held said.

The survey showed that, across Jewish institutions, finances were the greatest barrier to entry for respondents in the "maybe" category.

In a presentation he prepared for UJA Federation's board of directors that he supplied to The CJN, Held said it was surprising to learn that finances proved such a significant barrier to families not only for sending kids to day school, but also to supplementary Jewish schools and residential camps.

"It's clear that the cost of engaging with the Jewish community, in any form, is a barrier we need to lower... especially for middle income families," he said.

Held stressed that the data must be "drilled into in more detail" over the coming months, in order to learn how to better attract those families in the "swing voter" category.

"It's incumbent on us and our agencies to face the new challenge of recruitment of these 'maybes' head on," he said. ■

Jews most targeted group in hate crimes: Toronto police

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

While the City of Toronto witnessed a drop in the number of hate crimes in 2015, Jews continued to be the single-most targeted victim group, though there were fewer incidents involving Jews than the year before.

According to the Toronto Police Service 2015 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report, 31 occurrences involved Jews – plus one that targeted an Israeli.

The next most commonly victimized group were members of the LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer) community, who were targeted 29 times. They were followed in number by Muslims, with 26 occurrences, and blacks, with 20.

In addition, among 10 separate incidents categorized as "multi-bias," which referred to actions that targeted more than one victim group, three victims were described as black and Jewish, one was Jewish and LGBTQ and another was distinguished as Jewish and Muslim.

Altogether 134 incidents were reported to police in 2015, a drop of 8.2 per cent from the 146 occurrences the year before.

In 2014, Jews, were also the single most targeted group, with 44 occurrences reported. The 31 incidents in 2015 represent a 29.5 per cent drop from the number in 2014.

Jews make up 3.8 per cent of the city's population, as measured by religious affiliation, yet in 2015 were victimized in nearly 24 per cent of the religiously motivated incidents.

Most of the incidents involved mischief to property, such as anti-Semitic graffiti or vandalism. Apartment buildings, schools and public places, such as laneways, were the most common location for mischief offences.

"The Jewish community was the most victimized group for mischief to property occurrences, while the LGBTQ community was the most victimized group for assault occurrences," the report stated. "The Muslim community was the most victimized group for criminal harassment occurrences."

Those incidents targeting Muslims spiked in November and may be attributed to a "negative backlash following the attacks in Paris, France, and the [Canadian] government's refugee settlement program," the report suggested.

Only 21 charges were laid against 19 persons in 2015, and only three of them were related to mischief offences.

Joel Reitman

Commenting on the police findings, Toronto Mayor John Tory said, "I think we have work to do in our society, making sure we put into action the values that we talk and brag a lot about.

"I don't think this is a job for the police. I think this is a job for each and every one of us as citizens. We have to better inform ourselves, we have to avoid what often happens, which is a rush to judgment about people based on their religion. I think that is true in recent times in the case of the Muslim faith," he stated.

"For the 10th year in a row the Jewish community continues to be the number one target of hate crime offenses in the City of Toronto... This is a devastating and unacceptable pattern of hate which should have alarm bells sounding in the corridors of Toronto's law enforcement, educational and political offices," said Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"It is clear that our civic leaders in all walks of life need to put a much greater effort into ensuring the safety and security of the city's Jewish minority, and to speak clearly and forcefully against a growing tide of anti-Semitism," he said.

Joel Reitman, co-chair of Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Toronto, said, "Unfortunately, it comes as no surprise that the Jewish community finds itself once again disproportionately targeted in reported hate-crimes in Toronto. This is hardly an anomaly, which is why the security of our community is CIJA's top priority. We offer a wide range of free services to ensure that Jewish institutions, their staff, and our community members are well protected. These services include security assessments, security briefings and tailored training sessions for security personnel.

"We strongly encourage staff and volunteers in the Jewish community who hold security-related responsibilities at their institutions to go to our website to learn more about the resources that are available," Reitman added. ■

Jewish groups decry loss of Office of Religious Freedom

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Andrew Bennett

Following a vote against a Conservative motion in the House of Commons to extend the mandate of the Office of Religious Freedom, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) expressed its disappointment and urged the government to reconsider.

David J. Cape, CIJA's chair said that although the office operated on a "relatively modest budget" of $5 million a year, "it established a number of practical initiatives to help protect at-risk communities and strengthen Canada's role as a leading voice for human rights. We also note that the office was instrumental in uniting diverse religious communities in Canada – including Jews, Christians, Muslims and Sikhs, among others – to work together as partners in this vital cause… We encourage the government to reconsider its decision."

The motion was defeated 226 to 90, with the Liberals, NDP and Green party voting against it.

The office was established in February 2013 by the Stephen Harper Conservatives with a three-year mandate and had a staff of five people, including Ambassador Andrew Bennett. Some critics had criticized it for being too focused on Christianity and saw it as an attempt to gain support from some ethnic voter groups.

In advance of the March 21 vote, Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion confirmed that while the government will continue to defend and promote religious freedom as a part of its human rights agenda, the office's mandate will expire March 31.

Dion added that the Liberal government is "determined to fight tooth and nail for religious freedom around the world," and that he appreciated the work the office has done.

"We have to consider whether it might not be more effective to combine all of Global Affairs Canada's efforts to defend and promote human rights into a single office to advance and to leverage the resources of the department in its embassy network around the world to advance this mission," Dion said.

"Canada will support every effort to speak out when human rights are in question or where people are being persecuted for who they are or for their beliefs, including when human rights defenders are arrested and threatened for daring to speak out against human rights."

Interim Conservative Leader Rona Ambrose posted a note on Facebook that called the vote a "sad evening in the House of Commons," as the office "advocated on behalf of religious minorities under threat, opposed religious hatred, and promoted Canadian values of tolerance. It also funded projects, which have helped groups in Iraq monitor and report on religious persecution."

She added: "Closing this office at a time when freedom of religion is under threat is truly shameful."

CIJA spokesperson Steve McDonald said the office was involved in projects from Holocaust commemoration activities to alleviating tensions in particular communities.

"They were active in Sri Lanka, in Nigeria, in Burma, in Pakistan in areas where there are often clashes and religious minorities are singled out and attacked," McDonald said.

"We engaged with [Bennett] not just on the Holocaust file… but we also began working with him on the persecution of Christians in the Middle East and Africa. On that file in particular, he was a great force in bringing together Eastern Christian leaders as well as Jewish community leaders to talk about these issues, to learn from one another and learn from these opportunities for joint advocacy."

He added that while the statement expressed CIJA's disappointment "we also noted that we are pleased with the fact that Dion's statement was very strong in saying that Canada is going to vigorously defend freedom of religion."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said, "In the face of continued divisiveness in our society, the Office of Religious Freedom provided a sense of inclusivity with government to many groups of numerous faiths. This is a loss for Canada and for anyone who believes in human rights and the sanctity of freedom of religion."

Michael Mostyn, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said the government's decision was "unfortunate."

"The Office of Religious Freedom was an important symbol to recognize the suffering and oppression so many face because of their faith. With acts of terror so often religiously motivated, now more than ever, Canada must enshrine the promotion of religious freedom as a cornerstone of its foreign policy," Mostyn said. ■

Canada should hitch its wagon to Israeli high-tech, ambassador urges

RON CSILLAG

Vivian Bercovici FLASH 90 PHOTO

Canada must get on Israel's high-tech juggernaut or risk lagging even further behind.

That was the message sounded by Canada's Ambassador to Israel, Vivian Bercovici, to a blue-chip luncheon audience March 24 to the venerable Empire Club.

"If you want to make it in global tech, in global innovation, you must be in Israel," Bercovici told about 400 people.

Since the early 1990s, Israel has become a global tech powerhouse rivalled only by the United States and China, an "economic miracle" that must contend with "unimaginable security challenges," she said.

Appointed Canada's envoy to Israel in January, 2014 by former prime minister Stephen Harper, Bercovici was in Toronto for a few days to help lay the groundwork for Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne's trade mission to Israel, slated for May 15 to 19. More than 100 leaders in business, politics, commerce and trade are expected to go.

In her talk, Bercovici stressed Israel's booming high-tech sector, and "a telling fact": In 2014, Israel spent 4.1 per cent of its gross domestic product on high-tech research and development. Canada, she said, spent 1.6 per cent of its GDP on R&D.

That means Israel is ranked No. 2 in the world by this metric, and Canada 19th.

However, in terms of actual dollar amounts spent on R&D, Canada is 13th in the world and Israel 22nd.

"If you want to support a robust economy with strong tech fundamentals, you have to invest the dollars," Bercovici said. "More than that, it also means you have to ensure your investment is tied to commercial viability."

While it's true that Canada is investing more money than Israel in R&D, "we're lagging in terms of technological prowess. And we are now in a game of catch-up. We must assess our strengths and weaknesses very critically and quickly, and we must deploy our considerable resources and talents very strategically."

Canada "cannot waste time. Tech power is economic power. Period."

Over the past few years, Bercovici said she has watched as other countries – South Korea, China, India, Britain and Australia – "have focused and accelerated their national tech investment on partnering with and investing in Israeli ventures. They're all over the place."

As well, Israeli companies represent the fourth-largest number of listings on the NASDAQ stock exchange, exceeded only by companies from the United States and China, and all of them are high-tech firms. "Pause and consider that for a moment," Bercovici urged. "Nobody can still be sitting here and saying 'Why do we want to be [in Israel]? Why do have to be there?' Everybody's there."

She touted other opportunities, such as water, in which Israel is a world leader in use, re-use, desalination, and recycling, as well as agri-tech, medical and health breakthroughs, cyber-security, aerospace, and a "tremendous opportunity" for Canada to help Israel extract and distribute recently discovered offshore natural gas deposits.

Canada "should be in the mix, and we're not. We have pockets of investment and activity. But we don't have near the representation a country our size and sophistication should.

"We will never sell a million TV sets there," Bercovici stated. "We will never have a balanced trade budget with Israel. Commercial relations with Israel are all about leveraging Israeli intellectual property and capital with assets and resources in our economy to enhance our productivity and spur our growth.

"We have to start to understand that here, because most other countries are way ahead of us. Other countries have all figured it out."

Bercovici was scheduled to be presented the Community Service Award for Israel at Beth Sholom Synagogue on March 29. ■

CIJA, JSpace and NIF discuss Mideast peace prospects

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Three speakers from Jewish advocacy groups on the centre and centre-left agreed that current prospects for Mideast peace are poor, with one blaming the lack of a partner on the Palestinian side for the impasse.

Hosted by Oraynu, Toronto's congregation for Humanistic Judaism, and held at the Borochov Cultural Centre, the March 22 panel featured Steve McDonald, deputy director of communications and public affairs at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA); Karen Mock, a human rights consultant and a founder of JSpaceCanada; and Joan Garson, chair of the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC).

They answered questions from moderator Rabbi Denise Handlarski, Oraynu's spiritual leader, about prospects for peace in Israel, the secular/religious divide among Israeli Jews, Israel's economic challenges and the role Canada should play in supporting and criticizing Israel.

On the question of peace, Mock said what's needed is mutual recognition followed by bilateral negotiations based on pre-1967 borders and leading to Palestinian statehood.

She added that the Palestinians must abandon the notion of pre-1948 borders as a starting point for talks, disavow violence and "demonstrate a willingness to stay the course of negotiations."

Garson said a lasting peace should be based on the values of Israel's founders as stated in Israel's Declaration of Independence, namely, the upholding of full social and political equality for all citizens, regardless of race, creed and sex.

In addition to stressing that Israel must oppose racism and "expand the shrinking democratic state," Garson said, "we must end the occupation and show we're not looking to build a state from the river to the sea, while remaining committed to Israel's security."

She conceded that currently, "with ISIS perched on the Syrian border," security feels more tenuous, but "without mutual respect for all communities and passion to seek peace, even if it seems far away today, that peace won't come."

McDonald took a harder line on prospects for peace, saying resistance on the Palestinian side has made it "elusive."

Since 1967 and through the Oslo process of the 1990s, he argued, Israel has tried to withdraw from land in exchange for peace. Since 2000, Israeli prime ministers have made three different offers that would have created a Palestinian state in Gaza and the West Bank, he said, but all were rejected without a counter proposal.

From left, Steve McDonald, Karen Mock, Joan Garson JODIE SHUPAC PHOTO

Most Israelis support a two-state solution, he said, yet recent polls showed that a large proportion of Palestinians support the stabbing campaign against Israelis.

"If an election were held today, [Palestinian President] Mahmoud Abbas would win. He has neither the credibility or will to make peace," he said.

McDonald added that the path to peace is one in which Israel works – ideally with the Palestinians, but if not, unilaterally – "to create economic opportunities for Palestinians, improve conditions in the territories and hope the Palestinians will one day have a leader... who's a partner for peace."

On divisions between religious and secular Israelis, Mock and Garson denounced circumstances they said have caused many secular and non-Orthodox observant Jews to feel like second-class citizens.

"The balance of power is in the hands of the Orthodox. They get to say which schools get more money and who's exempt from military service, and they maintain a grip on the laws of marriage and conversion," Mock said, suggesting that electoral reform could help resolve these issues.

McDonald said he sees the religious/secular divide in Israel as a "greater existential conflict than that between Israel and Palestine."

He praised efforts being made in the haredi community to integrate its members into the military and work force.

He said the haredi community's primary concern is losing children to secularization and that Israelis' ultimate goal should be "unity, not uniformity," since "the last thing we should do is tear ourselves apart from within." ■

Toronto man fundraises to buy bikes for Israeli kids

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Building off the success of a project that began in 2008 to provide needy Israeli children with bicycles, Yehoshua Wolman decided to step up his efforts with a crowdfunding campaign to reach even more children.

Wolman explained that several years ago, he took a course in bicycle mechanics and decided he wanted to use his expertise to benefit children in Israel.

"I established an organization called bicycles4israel, which aimed to take used bicycles, which were donated by the Toronto Jewish community, repair them if needed, and ship them to Israel," said Wolman, who currently works in a bike shop in Toronto.

He said that following an article about his project that ran in The CJN in 2008, he gathered about 200 bikes from Toronto's Jewish community.

"These bikes were beaten up, and some were scrap, so I decided initially to repair them and send them to Israel... and my counterpart in Israel did the legwork to see if it was feasible," Wolman said.

He said that tariffs and fees for the shipment made it too expensive. He decided instead to sell the bikes in Toronto, and used the funds to purchase bikes in Israel for needy kids.

Yehoshua Wolman

> Religious kids don't play much sports, so their greatest joy is a bicycle.

"I decided to continue repairing bikes and have periodic bike sales from my garage, and over the years I got a following. I had repeat customers and all the money collected went into a special account," he explained.

Wolman said that in late 2015 he contacted his friends in Israel and asked them to find "a good shop that would provide the best deal."

In January, Wolman travelled to Israel and was able to purchase 40 bicycles that were given to needy children in Safed.

"Religious kids don't play much sports, so their greatest joy is a bicycle. It's recreational and also for transportation to yeshiva or cheder or whatever," Wolman said.

"It went off with great success and great emotion," he said, with a quiver in his voice. "I said, 'I can't stop now.' I knew I wasn't going to wait another seven years to sell enough bikes to purchase more bikes in Israel."

He said his friend suggested he start a crowdfunding campaign to call on members of the community to donate to the cause.

"I had never heard of Go Fund Me, but I spoke to a friend and he suggested this website and it sounded good and I'm in the midst of it right now," he said.

He started collecting for the crowdfunding campaign in February and so far has raised more than $400 of his $20,000 goal, which he hopes to reach by June. He hopes the $20,000 will translate into about 100 bikes.

Wolman said the reaction from the community about his ambition has been nothing but positive.

"They're giving me good vibes," he said with a laugh. ■

New head of Mizrachi Canada focuses on youth

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

With his appointment as new executive director of Mizrachi Canada, an international religious Zionist non-profit group, Rabbi Elan Mazer said he's committed to helping the organization change its focus to engage a new generation of young Jews.

Speaking to The CJN in the weeks following the announcement that Rabbi Mazer would be taking over from Rabbi Meir Rosenberg, who retired following a 10-year stint as Mizrachi Canada's executive director, the 28-year-old Montreal native said he grew up "very much in a Mizrachi system."

"I grew up with both the ideology as well as the education from the Mizrachi world. That very much defined where I was headed and what I'm doing right now," Rabbi Mazer said.

He attended Montreal's religious Zionist school, the Hebrew Academy, and was involved with Bnei Akiva, a North American religious Zionist organization. He said it was at the Bnei Akiva camp, Moshava, where he met his wife, Nomi.

He was 17 when he decided to make aliyah. He joined the hesder program at Yeshivat Hakotel, a five-year joint army and yeshiva program. He served in the combat engineering corps of the Israel Defence Forces.

"I was living in the Old City of Jerusalem for five years, which was very special. To be actually living the dream, to look around and know that you're living, not only your own personal dream, but what the Jewish people have been dreaming about for 2,000 years, was very empowering," Rabbi Mazer said.

Although he was living his personal dream in the Old City, he said coming back to Canada as a shaliach was always part of the plan.

"I always say it was a way of fully giving back, something that my shlichim inspired me [to do]…"

Three years ago, Rabbi Mazer came to Toronto with his wife and children to serve as a spiritual adviser, at the Bnei Akiva schools: Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanot Orot Girls' School.

Rabbi Mazer said he is now committed to helping Mizrachi Canada join the international effort to change the organization's focus.

"Mizrachi Canada is now in the midst of a rejuvenation, not only in Toronto, but across the world. This is something that is happening in the Israeli headquarters of World Mizrachi in Jerusalem, as well as all across North America, England, Australia and South Africa," he said.

Rabbi Elan Mazer

"The relationship between Israel and the Diaspora is going through a transition. In the past, the goal was building the state. In that sense, the role of Diaspora Jewry was to help Israel come to life, help them grow, physically and spiritually."

He said that the goal of World Mizrachi is no longer about galvanizing Diaspora Jews to lend a helping hand to a fledgling state.

"I think there is much more of a partnership, much more of a feeling that we are in this together. Both the Diaspora and Israel are working together in order to grow on both ends," he said.

About two years ago, a new director general of World Mizrachi came in, a man by the name of Rabbi Doron Perez, and he has been leading the revolution across the world… [We're] creating a sense of activism and partnership within young adults and the next generation of the Jewish communities here."

National president of Mizrachi Canada, Jerry Rosenfield, said in a statement, "We're confident Rabbi Mazer will attract a younger demographic and deepen our community's connections to the Torah, the people and the land of Israel."

Rabbi Mazer, who took this role on for the short term, as he has plans to return to Israel, said his goal is for Mizrachi to become an organization that facilitates an active role for Diaspora Jews in Israel's continued growth.

"The reason I took this job is because I strongly believe that no matter where you are in the world, the more you are a part of the building of the state of Israel, both in a spiritual and physical way, the greater your sense of identifying as part of the Jewish people will be." ■

Montreal genealogist had key role in case of oldest man

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thejcn.ca, MONTREAL

The designation earlier this month of a 112-year-old Israeli as the world's oldest living man by Guinness World Records would not have been possible without the sleuthing of Stanley Diamond, the Montreal-based executive director of Jewish Records Indexing-Poland (JRI).

The exacting Guinness organization was not convinced by Yisrael Kristal's claim that he was born on Sept. 15, 1903 in the town of Zarnow. He did not possess documentation that Guinness regards as irrefutable proof.

When Diamond read about Kristal and his supporters' bid for the oldest title in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz about six weeks earlier, he knew he had to help.

Diamond was by no means certain he could come up with what Guinness required, but he knew that if anyone could find that vital missing piece it would be JRI. Diamond founded the non-profit JRI 21 years ago, an outgrowth of his amateur genealogical research into his own Polish Jewish roots sparked by discovering he had a rare genetic condition.

Today, JRI is the largest, fully searchable database of indexes to Jewish vital records accessible online – for any country. Five million records from more than 550 Polish towns are now indexed, and more are added all the time.

Unfortunately, those records did not include a birth certificate for Kristal. Diamond found that the vital records for Zarnow, the small town nearest the village where Kristal was actually born, have not survived.

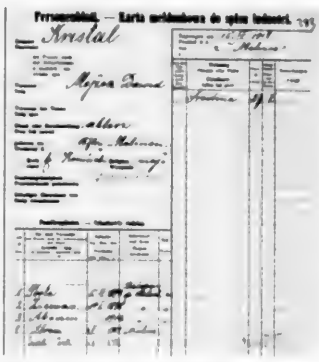
"Although Kristal has postwar international tracing service records and immigration papers to Israel [with his age], they are more than 20 years old, which Guinness does not accept," Diamond explained.

The first breakthrough in JRI's sleuthing was the discovery in the state archives of Kristal's residency card in Lodz, thanks to the co-operation of the director of the Lodz archives, a longtime collaborator of Diamond's, and the work of JRI's database manager, Michael Tobias in Glasgow, Scotland.

At 17, Kristal had gone to that city to rejoin his father who had come back from Russia and had a candy business.

He was known in Poland as Izrael Icek.

The card shows his birth year as 1903 – and this document is within Guinness's 20-year limit.



This Lodz residency card shows Yisrael Kristal's name (Izrael Icek) written with the birthdate of 1903 in the left-hand column.

But it was not enough. Diamond then came upon Kristal's marriage banns to his first wife published in the town of Malagoszcz in 1928. The rabbinical certification stated that the groom was 25 years old.

But alas that record was more than 20 years after Kristal's alleged birth date.

Then Diamond had a "eureka moment" when he discovered birth protocols, a type of sworn statement, attached to the banns for both Kristal and his bride.

They had been cut off on the right-hand side when first scanned.

That was sufficient to convince Guinness, and on March 11 it confirmed Kristal as the world's oldest man (but only the 32nd oldest person, those older than him all being women.)

"The key thing in all this is to underline that [Jewish] records do survive, that people can follow a paper trail, and that we can help them do that," said Diamond.

JRI has frequently been called upon to find proof of age, but has never undertaken a project quite like this.

"Often, I've had people right here in Montreal come for help because when they immigrated they said they were younger than they were. Then when they have reached pension age, they need proof of their real age to get those benefits," he said.

Kristal survived the Lodz ghetto and Auschwitz. His first wife and two children perished in the Holocaust. Kristal immigrated to Israel, to Haifa, where he still lives, in 1950. ■

GUEST VOICE

A holy society out West

Susan Dvorkin

The Chevra Kadisha of Calgary held its annual volunteer dinner last month, and in the same fashion as they conduct their business, the evening was low key, unassuming and without fanfare.

Is it appropriate to celebrate an institution that deals with death? The dinner's purpose wasn't to celebrate the business of death, but rather to take pride in the chevra's role in the community and, more importantly, recognize and acknowledge its many volunteers, without whom this organization would not exist.

Calgary's chevra kadisha is one of a very few in North America that are able to support their Jewish community's burial needs solely through the tireless efforts of volunteers, and it's been doing so for more than 108 years.

Volunteers come together as a community, regardless of their personal philosophies or levels of observance, to honour the centuries-old tradition of preparing the deceased for their final journey with the utmost respect and dignity. In this way, they link themselves to their people's past, present and future while performing the mitzvah of chesed shel emet, the last act of loving kindness, for which repayment is neither expected nor repaid.

Volunteers of any chevra kadisha have always been referred to as a holy or sacred society, and those who participate in the various tasks have often done so anonymously. While that is respectful of traditions, this anonymity can make it difficult to recruit new volunteers.

Although many are involved because their parents and grandparents also volunteered, without a newer generation of volunteers, the tradition of hand-sewn tachrichim (shrouds) created by the women, may end, to be replaced by imports from factories in the East.

Undoubtedly, in larger communities such as Toronto and Montreal, business is done in a more commercial manner by outsourcing and purchasing tachrichim. But the way Calgary's chevra honours, cares for and buries its dead completely "in house" says so much about this small, but very caring, Jewish community.

> All Jews, regardless of communal affiliation or non-affiliation, are entitled to a proper Jewish burial.

All Jews, regardless of communal affiliation or non-affiliation, are entitled to a proper Jewish burial, and the chevra won't deny anyone this honour, even if financial hardship is an issue. A situation may also occur in which the chevra is given the important task of burying a met mitzvah – a deceased who has nobody else to take care of his or her funeral. To this end, the fundamental principle of kibud hamet (honouring the deceased) is reinforced, as every person is treated equally and in the same manner – the shrouds used are the same for everyone, and the casket used is usually the same for everyone as well.

At some point in their lives, every Jew in Calgary will have to use the services of the chevra kadisha. It brings them together as a community at perhaps their greatest time of need. Death is not something many wish to speak about, plan for or be associated with, because it is accompanied by sorrow and pain. Donating one's time, as a volunteer is truly a mitzvah because there is no repayment.

The volunteers in this small Jewish community are truly priceless. They are asked to perform their duties with love and respect, and often with very little notice. They ensure that the deceased is properly prepared for their final appearance and judgment before God and their passage into the Olam Haba (the world to come.

What a wonderful mitzvah to be proud of! ■

Salomon Benzimra fought tirelessly for Israel

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

To those who knew and supported his work, he was a tireless fighter for a cause too often overlooked.

Salomon Benzimra, a staunch advocate for what he argued was Israel's rightful land title under the 1920 San Remo conference and a vocal opponent of what he saw as the international community's legal violation of this title, died March 15 of a massive heart attack.

He died at age 72 on an El Al flight back to Toronto from Israel, where he'd met with Deputy Foreign Affairs Minister Tzipi Hotovely and Education Minister Naftali Bennett to discuss Israel's land rights.

Benzimra was a chemical engineer by profession, but had, since 9/11, steeped himself in the historic legal documents of the British Mandate for Palestine, a resolution that came out of the San Remo conference, which was attended by the principal Allied powers of World War I and determined the partitioning of the Ottoman Empire's territories in the Middle East.

Through speaking engagements, his work with Canadians for Israel's Legal Rights (CILR), a group he co-founded in 2009, and his 2011 book The Jewish People's Rights to the Land of Israel – published in English and Hebrew as an e-book – Benzimra used his study of the British Mandate to argue that the United Nations Partition Plan for Palestine was illegal, as it contained a clause forbidding the transfer of the land.

"His life's aim was for the government of Israel to claim its legal land rights, from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea," said Goldi Steiner, who co-founded CILR with Benzimra.

"He wasn't technically an expert in law, but there were many times that lawyers would comment that his was superior to any lawyer's mind – it was very clear," she added.

In addition to meeting with Israeli politicians, Benzimra and Steiner collaborated with the European Coalition for Israel to host an educational event in San Remo, Italy, in 2010, to marking the 90th anniversary of the San Remo Conference. It was attended by politicians and activists from Europe, the United States and Canada.

Benzimra was born in 1943 in the international zone of Tangiers (now Morocco), into a Spanish-speaking family whose roots trace back to Inquisition-era Spain. His ancestors were among the many Jews who crossed the Straits of Gibraltar to escape persecution during the 1400s.

Benzimra's mother died when he was a child, and he was raised by an uncle.

He was educated in Paris and immigrated to Canada, living first in Montreal and then moving to Toronto in 1976.

As an engineer, he worked for the United Nations, the World Bank and several large chemical companies.

"He was the most gentle, humble and good-hearted person I've ever met – this has been corroborated by everyone who's reached out to me since his death. He stood for justice and truth," Steiner said.

Mark Vandermaas, director of training for Israel Truth Week, said Benzimra, whom he met in 2012, had "a really profound effect on me and the work I do reaching out to pro-Israel people."

Vandermaas often came to Benzimra, who he said was "modest and respectful," with legal questions. He noted that Benzimra's book, intended as a teacher's guide for high school students, which Steiner said was delivered to all members of the Knesset, is "a powerful tool to show the world that it had given the Jewish People back its homeland."

Benzimra was dismayed by Israel's portrayal in the media and the Israeli government for, Vandermaas said, "not holding up its land title deed... he felt what was missing from the debate on the pro-Israel side was the use of a moral argument to counteract the anti-occupation stuff... He felt it was like a neighbour accusing you of stealing your land. Wouldn't you then hold up your title deed?"

Vandermaas said Benzimra was well liked by everyone, even those who disagreed with him.

"He really was a warrior for the dignity and good of the Jewish People." ■

Frank Medjuck was a pillar of Halifax's Jewish community

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

The Halifax and Atlantic Jewish communities lost a dear friend, strong contributor and devoted volunteer when Frank Medjuck passed away March 14 after a two-year battle with cancer.

The 71-year-old graduate of Dalhousie University Law School and holder of a master's degree in urban planning from University College of London, was a two-time president and 40-year board member of Beth Israel Synagogue, with which he had a deep and personal relationship.

He established the congregation's endowment fund in the 1980s, meeting with many members of the community to help them direct their tzedakah toward the long-term financial stability of Beth Israel.

In 1989-90, he devoted hundreds of hours to editing a 100th-anniversary commemorative book that drew histories from 120 families of the Halifax community. He served on virtually every committee of the synagogue, ensuring the Orthodox traditions were retained and followed, and he participated in daily minyanim, weekly Shabbat services and every holiday celebration.

In 1993, he also edited a 50th-anniversary book about Camp Kadimah where he spent a dozen summers of revelry, mischief, learning and developing lifelong friendships.

Frank Medjuck

After his university years and travel time, Frank, the youngest of three sons of Irving and Blanche Medjuck, worked with his oldest brother Ralph, also a lawyer, in a thriving real estate development business. Frank was primarily corporate counsel for the Centennial Group, working with city council on planning and gaining approval for various projects. He helped engineer some of the biggest real estate deals in Atlantic Canada, as well as some in Ontario and Alberta. Frank's efforts helped build Yonge-Richmond Place and Cambridge Suites in Toronto.

"It's sad. And he was so young," said Ralph, 83. "We worked together on probably half of the company's 56 projects. We got along well. Never had an argument."

Cousin-in-law Victor Goldberg said Frank and Ralph were a team.

"Ralph was the visible one, but Frank was the details person. Frank was pivotal for all the contracts and zoning issues and negotiating with the city."

Ralph called Frank "quiet and intelligent," but many of his friends thought he was far from quiet. He had a wry sense of humour, willing to joke about any situation if it would resolve an issue.

Mark Appleton of Halifax said, "I'll miss his jokes. With a very straight face, Frank would tell you something that was totally believable, stringing you along with fact after fact until, after several minutes, the zinger would come out of his mouth. And then the smile and the laugh, that warm laugh."

He loved Israel, inspired from growing up surrounded by Zionist Jewish values at Camp Kadimah and in the Halifax Jewish community. Around the time of the Six Day War in 1967, he became enchanted with a passion to live in Israel, to work the land and help build the country. In 1970, he made aliyah, lived in an absorption centre and studied Hebrew.

He was hired by the municipality of Jerusalem to work in its urban planning unit as a development control officer. He would often talk of those exciting times to be working in city planning for the iriya, the municipality of Jerusalem, with huge economic growth, a population explosion and great prosperity.

Over the years, he visited Israel regularly, staying connected to his beloved homeland, nurturing numerous close friendships there and spending valued time working the land.

He spent decades finding the burial spot of his grandfather, Yehoshua Medjuck, who made aliyah in 1935 from Halifax, and died in Israel during the War of Independence in 1948. He was buried on the Mount of Olives under the cover of darkness. The precise location of the grave was unknown for decades until, after years of research and interviews, Frank found the location, and eventually set a stone on the correct place.

Frank was a good friend, respectful, charitable and funny. Great with words, he loved to write and talk and learn new things. An eclectic man, he loved riding bikes, baking – he was the lead at hamantashen bakes at the shul – flying kites and telling jokes. He was a lifelong athlete and played masters basketball until two years ago, when illness prevented him from continuing. At 60, he completed a 350-km bike marathon from Jerusalem to Eilat when he was first about to become a grandfather. Eight years later, when he was anticipating turning 70, he did it again.

To Frank Medjuck, a good name and good reputation were paramount. Frank was always the person who helped someone privately, or gave generously of his money and his personal time to help raise someone's spirits or to help pay for a community event.

While speaking of her father at his chosen resting place at Eretz HaChayim Cemetery near Bet Shemesh in the Jerusalem Hills, Bena Medjuck-Bruckner said, "In his final months, Dad was worried about his unfinished tasks, things he had started or dreamed of starting, household projects, and future family celebrations that he would miss. We assured him that he prepared us well and that he is leaving things in good hands. We promised to take care of each other and keep his memory strong in our hearts and in our lives."

Frank is survived by wife Hedda, daughter Bena (Gustavo) Medjuck-Bruckner, and son Jacob (Shauna Nep), four grandchildren, and two older brothers, Ralph (Shirlee), and Harold, plus many nieces, nephews and cousins. ■

BDS will vanish if Israel takes steps to peace: EU envoy

RAPHAEL AHREN
JERUSALEM

Without the Israeli-Palestinian conflict there would be no boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, the European Union's envoy to Israel said March 28, arguing that the best way to fight BDS is to take steps to advance a two-state solution.

"The most effective antidote against the BDS movement is to solve the Palestinian issue. If there were no Palestinian issue, there would be no BDS movement," Ambassador Lars Faaborg-Andersen said at a conference in Jerusalem.

At the very least, the boycott movement "would swing into virtually nothing" if there was no Israeli-Palestinian conflict "to tag onto," he argued.

The EU does not expect Israel to be able to solve the conflict unilaterally, the ambassador stressed. "It takes two to tango. It takes the Palestinians also." But it is important for Israel not to be seen as undermining a two-state solution, he said. "If more effort is put into showing a will to move forward and to obtain progress in this process, it would greatly weaken the BDS movement."

Faaborg-Andersen added BDS is a "rather marginal" phenomenon that currently "has very little effect" on Israel. "That means that we have to, of course, stay vigilant in order to ensure it does not get further boosts and does not get further support. But I think it's important to keep a sense of proportions here and ensure that we're not to talking up this phenomenon rather than talking it down, and thereby giving it a platform that it really doesn't have."

There is "big difference between legitimate criticism of policies and BDS," he said. "There's a great risk, by lumping things together that really don't belong together that you first of all give the BDS movement a prominence that it doesn't have. And secondly that you cut off dialogue and conversation with those who are critical of the policies but are not supporters of BDS."

Earlier during the conference, which was organized by the Yedioth Ahronoth daily newspaper, Faaborg-Andersen expressed the EU's desire to see Israel thrive and said the union completely rejects any efforts to boycott Israel. "Let me make one thing 100 per cent clear: The European Union is against BDS. Our policy is totally opposite of BDS. Our policy is one of engagement with Israel."

> Our policy is totally opposite of BDS. Our policy is one of engagement with Israel.

The EU has "a long track record to prove" his point, Faaborg-Andersen said, citing the $30 billion (US) bilateral trade volume and the fact that the EU is Israel's "most important partner in science and technology."

However, the envoy stressed, the EU thinks settlements are illegal under international law and a hindrance to the peace process. Settlement goods are sold freely and are "welcome on the European market," he said, though they do not enjoy preferential customs treatment – products from Israel proper do –and have to carry an indication that they are from the settlements.

"Not even the Israeli government claims that the West Bank is part of Israel. So why would products coming from the West Bank be labelled as from Israel? We have no problems with those products; they just have to be correctly labelled," he said. "This doesn't amount to any kind of boycott."

The EU's envoy further said the union has recognized "on several occasions" that Israel "doesn't face a level playing field" in international forums, such as the United Nations Human Rights Council.

No other country is singled out for routine scrutiny the way Israel is, he acknowledged. "We have been critical of that and we have also been trying in various ways to help Israel in overcoming some of these obstacles they are facing in terms of an unequal playing field in the Human Rights Council, for example."

But there's only so much the EU can do, he added. "We are 28 voices but the council is much bigger than that. So therefore we have to abide by the rule of the majority. And our position continues to be that these bodies, even though we might not always agree with the majority view, these bodies are important for international dialogue. And therefore our policy with them is also one of engagement."

Faaborg-Andersen's participation in the conference, and his appearance on a panel with former settler leader Dani Dayan, had led to harsh criticism from the BDS movement. In an open letter posted online, BDS activists called on the EU to withdraw the senior diplomat from the panel.

But Faaborg-Andersen said he was "totally undeterred" by these calls. "Sometimes I'm criticized by extremist settlers and today I am criticized by the BDS movement."

Israeli President Reuven Rivlin, who also spoke at the conference, said that delegitimization of Israel lies at the core of the BDS movement, but warned against blacklisting legitimate criticism of Israel.

"We must distinguish between criticism and delegitimization when we deal with the BDS. Criticism can be given also among friends, but it is important to make sure that it does not turn into the delegitimization of Israel," he said.

Not everyone who criticizes Israeli policies opposes the state's right to exist, the president continued. "The fact that we can bear criticism and successfully explain our positions in a debate within Israeli democracy is our strength. We must realize that there is no other way." ■

Palestinian causes not more pressing than other issues, Islamic State says

JTA
JERUSALEM

The Islamic State (IS) said in its weekly newspaper that it has not focused on attacking Israel because it does not believe the Palestinian cause is more significant than other issues affecting Muslims.

According to the Times of Israel, which cited a translation by the Middle East Media Research Institute, a March 15 article in IS' al-Naba said, "If we look at the reality of the world today, we will find that it is completely ruled by polytheism and its laws, except for the regions where Allah made it possible for the Islamic State to establish the religion.... Therefore, jihad in Palestine is equal to jihad elsewhere."

The article also criticized late secular Arab leaders, such as Egypt's Gamal Abdel Nasser and Iraq's Saddam Hussein, for pressing the belief that "Palestine is the Muslims' primary cause."

The article calls for jihadists to fight the "infidels" nearest to them, leaving the fight against Israel to the Muslim Palestinians.

The article argues that jihadis should focus first on toppling the Arab regimes, which it believes defend Israel, and only when that is accomplished should they approach "the borders of [the] Jew[ish] State and confront its army directly," according to The Times of Israel.

But it notes that Muslims have a religious duty to bring Palestine back into the "house of Islam" and should send aid to Palestinians who are fighting Israel.

The article encourages those unable to travel to the Middle East to fight Israel to attack "the Jews and their allies wherever they find them, [by] killing them, destroying their property, and harming their intereats in any way they can." ■

Netanyahu faces criticism over shooting of Palestinian

NOGA TARNOPOLSKY
JERUALEM

Israeli Prime Benjamin Netanyahu faced a revolt from his more extreme right-wing ministers following his condemnation of an Israeli soldier who shot dead a Palestinian assailant who lay wounded and subdued on the ground following an attack on a group of soldiers.

The March 24 incident in Hebron was captured on video by a fieldworker for B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights NGO. On the video a man can be heard saying "this terrorist is still alive, this dog."

"What happened in Hebron does not represent the IDF's [Israeli Defence Forces] values," Netanyahu initially said when the video was released the next day. "The IDF expects its soldiers to act calmly and in accordance with the rules of engagement."

Army prosecutors charged the soldier, who is not being named, with murder at the Jaffa Military Court on March 25 after an initial investigation concluded that he shot the disarmed and wounded Palestinian assailant after the latter no longer constituted a threat.

Spying an opportunity to attack the prime minister, at Sunday's cabinet meeting Education Minister Naftali Bennett, of the extreme right-wing Jewish Home party exclaimed, "Why is he being led to court in handcuffs? What kind of message does this send to thousands of soldiers? An indictment for 'murder'? You're confused about who the good guys are and who the bad guys are! Why is the entire leadership dancing to the tune of B'Tselem?"

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sara visit soldiers of the Kfir battalion at the Etzion regional brigade, in the West Bank on Purim. Netanyahu has been under criticism for his condemnation of the soldier who shot dead a subdued Palestinian.

By Sunday, defending himself from right-wing attacks, Netanyahu had shifted his tone, and said "any challenge to the morality of the IDF is outrageous and unacceptable. The soldiers of the IDF, our children, maintain high ethical values while courageously fighting against bloodthirsty murderers under difficult operational conditions. I am certain that in all cases, as in the current one, the inquiry takes into account all conditions. We must all support the IDF chief of staff, the IDF and our soldiers, who safeguard our security."

Outside the cabinet, former foreign minister Avigdor Lieberman, of Yisrael Beiteynu [Israel Our Home], another right-wing party, snarled that "the prime minister is worthy of being called the ultimate weather vane. I saw Netanyahu's first statement, and then he saw where the winds were blowing - and flipped his position. How can a soldier even expect a fair investigation, a fair trial, when all in the proper authorities in the IDF already know what the commander wants?"

The initial findings of the Israeli army's probe into the incident are devastating to the soldier, whose lawyer claims his client acted because he feared the stabber may have been wearing an explosive jacket hidden under his shirt.

MEDJUCK, FRANK, ז"ל

The Yeshiva University family and the Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University are grieved by the passing of Frank Medjuck ז"ל. Frank was a dynamic leader on behalf of many worthy causes for Halifax and world Jewry. He was especially close to Yeshiva University as his older brother, Ralph Medjuck, served as the Chairman of the Atlantic Provinces Region of the CFYU, and in his role as President of the Beth Israel Synagogue, Frank consulted with Rabbinic leaders at Yeshiva University.

Heartfelt condolences to his wife Hedda and to his children and grandchildren: Bena (and Gustavo) Medjuck-Bruckner and family, and Jacob (and Shauna) Medjuck, and to his brothers, Ralph (and Shirley) Medjuck and Harold (and Helene) Medjuck and to his nieces and nephews.

Frank Medjuck was respected and admired and will be surely missed by all who knew him. May the entire family be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

OPINION

Israel needs a strong and confident America

Sagi Melamed

On my last visit to the United States I watched a television debate with the candidates for the Republican party nominee for president. Although jetlag got the better of me before the end, I still managed to learn some things from what I saw.

The bad news was my surprise and disappointment that these are the candidates, the best available options that Great America is offering its voters.

The good news was that, compared to the crudities expressed by the U.S. Republican candidates and the low standard of debate among them, the standards and styles of some of the Israeli politicians, suddenly look good.

On my return to Israel, my brother Amichai asked me: "Which candidate is best for Israel?" I considered for a moment, then answered that although a good question (and one I have difficulty answering), it is not the most important one. The most important question is: Which candidate is best for America?! Because Israel needs a strong America, a confident America, with ethics and leadership – no matter who the U.S. president is.

The late Israeli prime minister Levi Eshkol, when he was told there was a drought in the south of the country, responded: "Drought? In the Negev?! For a moment I was worried – I thought you meant in the United States…"

Why does Israel need a strong America?

Firstly, the United States and Israel, despite occasional differences of opinion and of language, style and size, have always shared similar values, world view, beliefs and lifestyle. Nowhere in the world do we have any better friend or partner than the United States.

Secondly, the entire world needs a leader, to provide a moral compass and for policing. A leader that will guide the way and influence how we deal with global challenges such as climate change, terrorism, human rights abuses and the acquisition of nuclear weapons. The world needs a moral compass to remind us that despite all its shortcomings, democracy is still the best and most moral method of government. And we need firm, steadfast policing that is ethical and moral (as much as possible), yet carries a big stick and knows how to use it when necessary. And no less important – all the malevolent actors of the world will believe that the police officer is willing and able to use the big stick if they try to do evil.

> Nowhere in the world do we have any better friend or partner than the United States.

Thirdly, many of the economic and financial variables of Israel are connected to the United States, the American economy, its stock markets and currency exchange. These variables include, among other things: exchange rates, foreign investments, foreign trade, philanthropic investments, credit ratings and investments in scientific research.

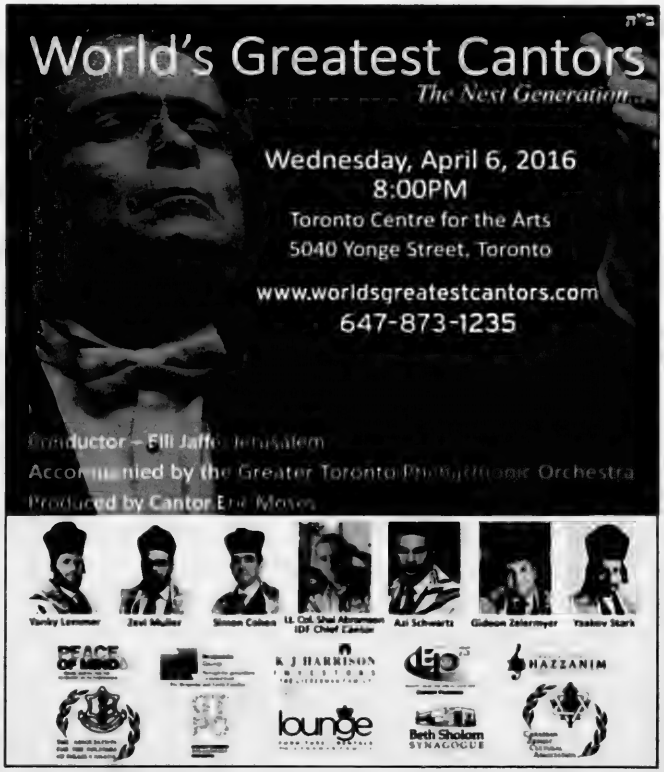
Fourthly, the Middle East is an unstable and violent region. With all due respect to our own power and our army, in our neighbourhood we need a trusted and strong friend who will not fear and will not hesitate to stand beside its bratty younger ally, to back him up and give him protection and support.

Finally – and I recognize that not everyone will agree with me on this – Israel sometimes needs a strong United States, sensible and involved, to save Israel from itself.

Although I have dual American and Israeli citizenships, I have so far chosen not to vote in American elections. In November 2016, once again, I will most likely not vote. But I will send Israel's best friend a verse from the Prayer for the State of Israel that we read each week, with best wishes and the hope that they will elect a president who is suitable, deserving and capable:

"May You guide its leaders and advisors with Your light and Your truth, and correct them with Your good counsel."

Good luck America! ■



Dion asks UN to review nomination of anti-Israel prof

DANIEL KOREN
dkoren@thecjn.ca

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion has joined the chorus of voices questioning the appointment of University of Western Ontario law professor Stanley Michael Lynk to the position of special rapporteur on the Palestinian territories by the United Nations Human Right Council (UNHRC).

Canadian MPs Michael Levitt, Tony Clement and Peter Kent have also questioned the professor's nomination over his alleged anti-Israel bias, as have several Jewish organizations.

A letter sent out by UNHRC president Choi Kyonglim March 23 proposed that Lynk be appointed to the position.

"We call on the UNHRC president to review this appointment and ensure [that the] special rapporteur has a track record that can advance peace in the region," Dion tweeted. "Canada will continue to advocate for transparent processes for the appointment of credible, impartial and objective special rapporteurs."

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, condemned the decision because of what he describes as Lynk's bias regarding the Israel-Palestinian conflict, calling the appointment a "travesty of justice and a breach of the world body's own rules."

"Someone who accuses Israel of 'apartheid' and openly seeks to dismantle the Jewish state is neither impartial nor objective," Neuer said in a statement, agreeing that Ottawa should take a strong stand against the appointment.

"Because Lynk is Canadian, the Trudeau government can play a critical role by making clear to the UN its opposition to the appointment of a manifestly partisan candidate for a post that, under the UN's own rules, requires complete impartiality," he told The CJN.

Neuer said Lynk also blamed the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on "global inequalities" and "disregard by western nations for the international rule of law," and proposed to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict by going "back to 1948, the date of partition and the start of ethnic cleansing."

Shimon Koffler Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), also "strongly denounced" Lynk's appointment. "Despite the specific requirement that candidates for the position demonstrate impartiality and objectivity, Mr. Lynk has a long record of involvement with anti-Israel initiatives and has repeatedly made public statements that demonstrate hostility towards Israel," Fogel said.

"Bodies like the UNHRC must be fundamentally restructured to ensure they are no longer abused as platforms for extreme agendas, but rather serve to advance the UN's founding ideals," he added.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) echoed Fogel's position, citing a recent letter to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau from Conservative MPs Tony Clement and Peter Kent, who charged that Lynk "plays a leading role in the Canadian Palestinian Education Exchange, a group that promotes Israeli Apartheid Week events, addresses 'one state' conferences that seek to eliminate Israel, and calls for the prosecution of Israel for war crimes."

Stéphane Dion

Liberal MP Michael Levitt said in a press release that Lynk's appointment is cause for "great concern."

"Michael Lynk... has demonstrated repeatedly that he is unsuitable to fulfil this position through his long record of anti-Israel activity," he said. "Given the concerns that I and others have expressed to Minister Dion, I am pleased that he instructed our ambassador to Geneva to reach out to the president of the council to underscore the importance Canada assigns to ensuring that the chosen candidate meet appropriate criteria of professionalism and neutrality.

"Clearly Michael Lynk does not meet this standard and I am exceptionally disappointed that he has been selected for this role. I know that Minister Dion shares this concern and I urge him and Global Affairs Canada to look into every available option after a full consideration of the facts."

In a statement to The CJN, Michael Mostyn, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said his organization is "ashamed that a Canadian will be assuming the mantle of chief propagandist for some of the world's worst human rights violators.

"By appointing Lynk, who has a long history of comparing Israel to the Nazis and promoting anti-Israel campaigns, the council has demonstrated its intent to continue its ongoing agenda of demonizing the world's only Jewish state," Mostyn said. "We call on the Canadian government to join B'nai Brith Canada in condemning this abhorrent appointment."

If his nomination becomes official, Lynk will replace Makarim Wibisono, who announced in January that he would step down over Israel's "refusal" to co-operate with his mandate, which many consider controversial, as it is limited to investigating Israel's human rights violations.

In his final report to the council on March 21, Wibisono citied a "lack of co-operation [that] regrettably seems to signal the continuation of a situation under which Palestinians suffer daily human rights violations under the Israeli occupation."

In a statement to The CJN, Lynk said he is unable to comment until he confers with the UN about his new role. "I would welcome, at the appropriate time, the chance to correct the misleading statements that have been said about me and my views," he said. ■

Soldier shot victim at point-blank range in the head

The investigation revealed that, following regulations, a superior officer had confirmed that the wounded assailant posed no danger and the incident was declared over. The soldier in question, a medic, left the scene only to return minutes later to a situation clearly under control, and, without consulting officers also on the scene, shot Abdul Fatah Al-Sharif at point-blank range in the head.

Servicemen interviewed by military police reported the accused soldier told them "the terrorist needs to die" after the Palestinian stabbed one of the soldiers and that his comrades "tried to calm him."

"The procedure for a situation in which there is suspicion the terrorist has an explosive belt on is clear and known, and includes telling the other troops to back away and be careful, something the soldier did not do," an IDF official told Israeli media.

Speaking with the Media Line, Elazar Stern, a parliamentarian representing the centrist Yesh Atid party, who previously served as the head of the army's manpower directorate and chief education officer, said there is "a very, very, very small possibility the soldier deviated from the rules slightly. On the face of it, it appears he simply flouted the rules completely. The event was over six minutes before he came back. There is absolutely no chance he obeyed the rules, which are clear and which I was taught and which I myself taught generations of soldiers."

Stern mentioned several incidents in which IDF soldiers, including himself, obeyed orders to protect the lives of Palestinian youths and put their own lives at risk."

Nava Boker, a member of the Knesset from Netanyahu's Likud party demanded that the Palestinian B'Tselem fieldworker be investigated for filming the incident in Hebron and on March 26 a group of right-wing activists filed a police complaint against Emad Abu-Shamsiyah, the cameraman.

B'Tselem said that Abu-Shamsiyah's Hebron home was attacked by Jewish Israelis living in post-1967 territory, throwing rocks and chanting "Death to Emad." IDF soldiers at the scene did not intervene, according to their report.

"When you take into account that the IDF chief of staff and the minister of defence have been attacked over this incident," Jessica Montell the former director of B'Tselem, told the Media Line, "it is not surprising that a Palestinian from the West Bank is also facing threats. This case has shocked everyone and it's causing a political furor."

Addressing the political firestorm, Stern said "the ongoing competition on the right to see who can be more extreme and to a certain extent the reasons behind the cabinet infighting are the very same causes that lead to an atmosphere in which a soldier could misunderstand matters and take them into his own hands.

"I have no doubt," he added, "that the IDF is the most moral army in world, and that is precisely because we are not tolerant of incidents like this." ■

Despite candidates' vows, Tel Aviv embassy is here to stay

Raphael Ahren
JERUSALEM

Republican candidates made a lot of promises to pro-Israel activists at the AIPAC conference last week in Washington, among them that the Iran nuclear deal will be gutted and the United States Embassy will be moved to Jerusalem. And all by Jan. 21, 2017.

Now for a reality check: No. To all of it.

Israelis hoping to see the promises made in Washington actually come to fruition will be sorely disappointed, experts say, pointing to the need for bipartisanship to push anything through the American political system.

The fact that American politicians still wholeheartedly declare they will be the one to move the U.S. embassy to Jerusalem is somewhat peculiar, since so many presidential hopefuls have vowed it before yet always failed to deliver on their promise.

"Believe me," Donald Trump said a whopping 12 times during his speech, but even if you give credence to his other incredible claims – for instance that he studied the Iran deal in greater depth "than anybody else" – don't believe him when he says he will move the embassy from Tel Aviv to Israel's "eternal capital of the Jewish people, Jerusalem."

Senator Ted Cruz, who is lagging far behind Trump in the primaries but still hopes to get the nod at the Republican National Convention in July, made the same pledge. He went one step further and vowed to begin the moving process on his "very first day in office." Many presidential candidates, both Republicans and Democrats, have promised the same, speaking to very same audience, Cruz acknowledged. "Here's the difference: I will do it," he said.

There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of such declarations. Cruz, like other right-wing American politicians, is probably genuinely inclined to move the embassy to Jerusalem, and might actually believe that he will do so. The problem is that even the commander-in-chief of the most powerful nation on earth cannot make such decisions all by himself, without taking into consideration his advisory council and many other important factors.

"Nobody is going to move the embassy," said Amnon Cavari, an expert on American presidential politics at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. "This is not a decision that depends on the personal preferences of the president. There is a status quo that has been maintained for a long time. Other countries have not moved their embassies, and it's not going to happen with the United States, either."

John Kasich, the third Republican candidate still in the race, called Jerusalem Israel's "eternal capital" but did not promise to move the capital. In his address to AIPAC, he also did not vow to cancel the Iran deal, but merely said he supports the "suspension of the U.S.'s participation in the Iran nuclear deal in reaction to Iran's recent ballistic missile tests" and that he would seek to immediately re-apply sanctions on Iran if the regime "violates one crossed T or one dot of that nuclear deal."

Republicans have been vowing to move the embassy since 1972

Grand but unrealistic statements about Israel are nothing new at AIPAC conferences. In June 2008, then-senator and presidential candidate Barack Obama said, to raucous applause, that Jerusalem "must remain undivided." He soon clarified – read: partially retracted – his statement.

In 2000, then-governor and presidential candidate George W. Bush told AIPAC that, "as soon as I take office I will begin the process of moving the U.S. ambassador to the city Israel has chosen as its capital."

But it didn't start with Bush. The idea of moving the embassy to Jerusalem is at least 44 years old. It was bruited in 1972 by Gerald Ford, then the minority leader in Congress. President Richard Nixon opposed the proposal, but the Republican party included it in its platform for that year's election. (It has been part of the party platform in at least the last five elections).

Ford, in his first press conference after being elected president in 1974, declared that he was no longer keen on moving the embassy from Tel Aviv. "Under the current circumstances and the importance of getting a just and lasting peace in the Middle East," he said, "that particular proposal ought to stand aside."

Yitzhak Rabin, who was then Israel's ambassador to Washington, later asked Ford about the embassy issue. "In the Oval Office you view things differently than from the House of Representatives," Rabin quoted Ford as replying.

The Republican candidates' promises to cancel the agreement with Iran are likely to suffer the same fate as their predecessors' vows to transfer the embassy.

"On the first day in office, I will rip this catastrophic Iranian nuclear deal to shreds," Cruz thundered at AIPAC. Trump similarly declared that his "No. 1 priority is to dismantle the disastrous deal with Iran. (He later added that "at the very least, we must enforce the terms of the previous deal to hold Iran totally accountable.")

But the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action, as the deal is formally known, is not a bilateral agreement between Washington and Tehran but was signed by Iran and six countries, which means that it would not be so easy to just cancel the pact, said Cavari, the IDC expert on U.S. politics. The U.S. dropping out of a multilateral agreement that took nearly two years to negotiate would severely damage Washington's ability to gather future international coalitions about anything, he posited. "I don't think it's going to happen."

Of course the Republican candidates also made promises that were just as pleasing to AIPAC conference goers but more realistic. They all vowed, for instance, to veto Palestine-related resolutions at the United Nations, to confront Iran over its non-nuclear regional aggression, to condemn Palestinian incitement, to fight the anti-Israel boycott movement, and so on.

But all these assurances, including rejecting Security Council resolutions seeking to impose terms on Israel, are pretty much consensus positions in American politics. Hillary Clinton, the leading Democratic presidential candidate, also pledged to "vigorously oppose" such a move.

Echoing her Republican rivals, the former secretary of state dubbed Iran an "extremist regime that threatens to annihilate Israel," one whose "unacceptable" ballistic missile tests should be punished by "more sanctions" from the international community. She committed herself to resolving any difference of opinion with Jerusalem "quickly and respectfully," and declared that Washington "should provide Israel with the most sophisticated defence technology so it can deter and stop any threat."

Clinton said many other things that were music to the ears of the AIPAC crowd, but two things she did not promise: to cancel the nuclear deal with Iran and to move the U.S. embassy. In fact, in her speech she did not mention Jerusalem once.

All of this is not to say that a Republican president would not be "better" for Israel than a Democrat. While the judgment on this question really depends on what one thinks is good for Israel, the assessment among many in the pro-Israel community that Republicans are more staunch supporters is a truism.

The ceaseless friction between the Obama administration and the current government in Jerusalem would appear to bolster the claim, to some extent, albeit for the time being. In the recent past, Israel has had relatively warm relations with a Democratic administration (that of Bill Clinton) and difficult ties with a Republican presidency (that of George H.W. Bush).

But whoever moves into the White House after Jan. 20, and regardless of his or her views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Israel's embassy will remain in Tel Aviv and the Iran deal will stay in place for the foreseeable future. ■

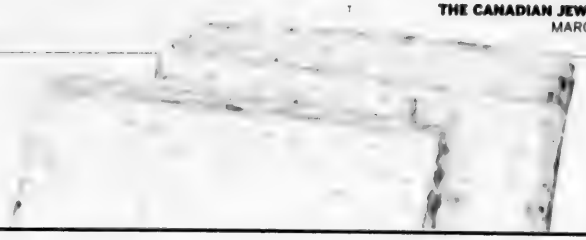
PASSOVER FOOD



Luscious lemons at Passover

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

If life gives you lemons, sweeten them with honey and cook with them! Your taste buds will jump for joy from the juicy lemon and honey tanginess found in the savoury dishes that I am presenting. Serve the three dishes together if you are a real lemon fan, or mix and match them with your other favourite dishes. This Passover is going to be extra luscious.

Crispy lemon almond broccoli

- 2 tbsp. oil
- 2 tbsp. fresh ginger, minced
- 1/2 cup unsalted almonds
- 1 tbsp. lemon zest
- 4 garlic cloves, minced
- 1/2 tsp. salt, plus additional salt to taste (optional)
- 1 large broccoli, cut into flowerets
- 2-4 tbsp. water
- 2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- lemon slices for garnish

Process almonds until they resemble a coarse meal.

Heat a large frying pan over medium heat for 90 seconds. Add 1 tbsp. oil and the ginger. Sauté until soft. Add in the almonds, lemon zest and garlic. Continue to sauté, stirring often, until mixture is toasted. Remove from heat and mix in 1/4 tsp. of the salt.

Place mixture in a bowl and wipe out the pan. Heat the pan again and add in the remainder of the oil. Raise the heat to high and stir fry the broccoli, drizzling the water, 3-4 minutes or until cooked through but still crunchy. Dust with remaining salt.

While the pan is still on the heat, put almond mixture over the broccoli along with the lemon juice and mix together. Sprinkle additional salt to taste (optional). Pour onto a serving platter or bowl and garnish with lemon slices. Serve immediately.

Lemon roasted potatoes

- 12-14 small potatoes, uniform in size
- oil spray
- 4 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
- 2 tbsp. margarine
- zest of one large lemon
- juice of one large lemon
- 2 tsp. honey
- 2 tbsp. fresh chopped tarragon or 2 tsp. dried tarragon
- 1 tsp. salt
- 1/2 tsp. pepper

Preheat oven to 400. Prepare a baking sheet with foil and spray it with spray.

Peel potatoes and immerse immediately in cold water. Mix together lemon juice, honey, tarragon, salt and pepper, set aside.

Heat a small frying pan and heat the oil, margarine and lemon zest; continue to stir until mixture turns golden brown. Drain the potatoes and pat them dry. Toss potatoes with lemon mixture and place them on baking sheet. Bake for 45 minutes. Baste potatoes with lemon juice mixture. Bake for 15 minutes more or until potatoes are golden brown and fork tender. Serve immediately.

Lemon and rosemary chicken breasts

- 4 lemons
- 3 tbsp. honey
- 1/2 cup of water
- 5 skinless/boneless chicken breasts
- 1 tbsp. dried rosemary
- 2 tsp. kosher salt
- 1/4 tsp. pepper
- 1/4 cup lemon juice
- 2 tsp. honey
- 1 tbsp. olive oil
- large Ziploc baggie
- extra olive oil or spray

Using a zester with five holes, remove the zest from the lemons. (A vegetable peeler can also be used, remove zest and then slice it very thin.) To prepare candied lemon zest, place zest, honey and water in a small pot. Bring to a simmer and cook until zest is translucent. Strain and cool.

Mix the rosemary, salt, pepper, candied lemon zest, lemon juice, honey and olive oil together in a small bowl. Pat the chicken breasts dry.

Brush the mixture onto the chicken on all sides. Place the prepared chicken in the Ziploc bag and pour in any remaining marinade mixture, seal and place in refrigerator for 2 hours. Preheat the oven to 450 and put the rack in the middle position. Prepare a baking dish sprayed or greased with olive oil. Place the chicken breasts onto the prepared pan, along with the remaining marinade. Bake for 15 minutes then turn the chicken breasts. Reduce oven temperature to 350. Continue baking another 30-35 minutes, or until chicken is cooked through. ■

The Canadian Haggadah canadienne: By Canadians and For Canadians

Richard Clark

Canada's Jewish community is unique. It is time that its experience translated into our own Haggadah.

Canada's Jewish community is the world's fourth largest – after Israel, the United States and France. It is an extraordinary vital, dynamic and productive community. It has a very different, distinct personality from that of other countries. And yet…

And yet, most of the books that we use are made in the United States, in Israel or in France. Rabbi Adam Scheier from Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and Richard Marceau, general counsel for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), set out to change this.

Rabbi Scheier and Marceau live and work in bilingual environments. Both interact with French and English speakers in their personal and professional lives. And, a few years ago, both walked away from their respective Passover seders with similar experiences.

Marceau says, "I was hosting a seder at home with French speakers and English speakers. My wife Lori and I were looking for a Haggadah to use that would be comfortable for both groups, and we could not find one. So we tried to use two at the same time (one English-Hebrew and the other French-Hebrew) but we all became lost. If it wasn't for the great company we had around the table, it would have not been a good seder. So I set out to create a Haggadah that could be used by bilingual families like mine."

Unbeknownst to Marceau, Rabbi Scheier was having similar issues: "I host seders at my home every year, and we love that our guest list represents the diversity of Canadian Jewry: Sephardim, Ashkenazim, Canadians-from-birth, those who have recently moved to Canada. Our seder table hosts many languages and customs, and I was looking for a way to make everyone comfortable around the table. When Richard and I met and shared our similar experiences, we decided to work together to have a trilingual Haggadah."

A partnership was born. The concept evolved, as both Rabbi Scheier and Marceau wanted more than simply a trilingual Haggadah. They wanted a truly Canadian product, one that would be representative of the Canadian Jewish experience and that would feature commentaries from rabbis from across the religious spectrum.

"Rabbi Scheier set out to contact his rabbinical colleagues from across Canada, I lined up the wonderful graphic artist and a good translator, and we both painstakingly pored through Jewish archives from coast to coast, as we wanted pictures of the Canadian Jewish experience, which would create meaningful conversations around the seder table," said Marceau.

"The Haggadah was a five-year project, one that required much more time and energy and travel than we expected at the beginning. We are very proud of the final product. It aesthetically beautiful, and rich with content and meaning. I am convinced that the Canadian Haggadah Canadienne will enhance the seder experience of every household that uses it", says Rabbi Scheier.

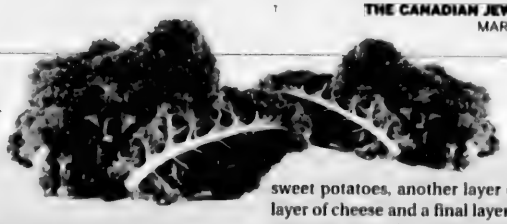
Kugels lend variety to the meal



DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The word "kugel" refers to the fact that kugels were originally made in a kugeltopf, an earthenware jar that sat on top of a soup or stew, and was essentially steamed as opposed to baked. Historically, it wasn't until well after the Middle Ages that most common folk owned an oven. Until then, only wealthy people had ovens in their home, and the townsfolk had to go to a common area, the local baker or the town's wealthy overlord, to bake their breads, sometimes for a fee.

Hence, the popularity of steaming a kugel. In fact, at that time, it was much easier to regulate some water or stew over a fire than in a rudimentary oven. With the popularization of the home oven in the mid-19th century, kugels increasingly became a baked dish. With the introduction of affordable sugar, they also made the leap into the sweet realm. Nowadays, you can pick and choose your kugel, and I sincerely hope you'll try the ones below, one for a dairy meal, one pareve and one sweet.

Sweet kugel with dried cherries and pistachios

The perfect brunch meal, this can be served at any time of year. During Passover, use the broadest kosher for Passover noodles you can.

- ❑ 1 lb. wide egg noodles
- ❑ 1 cup dried sour cherries, chopped
- ❑ 2 cups whipping cream
- ❑ 2 cups cottage cheese
- ❑ 4 large eggs
- ❑ 2 large egg yolks
- ❑ 3/4 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 1 cup dried sour cherries, chopped
- ❑ 2 cups crushed matzah
- ❑ 2/3 cup shelled pistachios
- ❑ 2 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted

In a large pot of boiling salted water, cook the egg noodles until al dente, about 8 minutes.

Preheat the oven to 350.

In a large bowl, whisk the whipping cream with the cottage cheese, eggs, egg yolks and sugar. Add the dried cherries to the bowl and then the noodles and stir. Pour the mixture into a 9-by-13-in. ceramic baking dish.

In another bowl, toss the crushed matzah with the pistachios, melted butter and a pinch of salt. Scatter the matzah mixture over the noodles and bake in the centre of the preheated oven until the noodle kugel is set and the topping is golden, about 45 minutes. Transfer the kugel to a rack and let cool slightly before serving.

Sweet potato and kale kugel

This is a terrific kugel for a luncheon during Passover or for when you're having a dairy meal.

- ❑ 2 tbsp. unsalted butter
- ❑ 1/2 large onion, chopped
- ❑ 5 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped fresh or dried chives
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 2 tsp. potato starch
- ❑ 2 cups whipping cream
- ❑ 3 sweet potatoes, thinly sliced
- ❑ 3 cups coarsely chopped fresh kale
- ❑ 1-1/2 cups shredded Swiss cheese
- ❑ 2 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese

Preheat the oven to 375. Lightly grease an 8-in. square glass dish.

Melt the butter in a large non-stick skillet set over medium-low heat. Add the onion and garlic; cook, stirring, just until the onion starts to turn golden, 8 to 10 minutes. Stir in the chives, salt and pepper, and potato starch. Cook, stirring constantly, for 1 minute. Pour the cream into the skillet; bring to a boil. Remove the skillet from the heat.

Arrange 1/3 of the sweet potatoes slices, slightly overlapping, in a single layer in the prepared pan. Layer with 1-1/2 cups of the kale and about 1/4 of the cheese. Repeat with another layer of sweet potatoes, another layer of kale, a layer of cheese and a final layer of sweet potatoes. Pour the cream mixture over this evenly. Top with the remaining cheese and the Parmesan. Cover the dish tightly with foil and place on a large rimmed baking sheet.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 30 minutes. Remove the foil. Bake for 30 to 40 more minutes or until the potatoes are tender and the top is a golden brown. Let stand for 10 minutes before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Potato, turnip and carrot kugel

The turnip and carrot add some natural sweetness to this kugel, which is nicely balanced by the earthy tones of the mushrooms.

- ❑ 5 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 2 large onions, cut in half and sliced into half moons
- ❑ 4 large cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 8 oz. chopped fresh mushrooms
- ❑ 2 tsp. dried thyme
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 6 russett potatoes, cut into wedges
- ❑ 2 turnips, cut into large pieces
- ❑ 1 large carrot, cut into large pieces
- ❑ 4 large eggs, lightly beaten
- ❑ 2 tbsp. coarse matzah meal

Preheat the oven to 400. Pour 3 tbsp. of the oil onto the bottom of a casserole dish. Place on a rimmed baking dish and place inside the oven.

Heat the remaining 2 tbsp. of oil in a large non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add the onions, garlic and mushrooms to the skillet. Cook, stirring occasionally, until the onions are golden and the mushrooms are starting to brown, 8 to 10 minutes. Stir in the thyme, salt and pepper and remove from the heat.

Meanwhile, in the bowl of a food processor fitted with the shredding attachment, or using a hand held grater, shred the potatoes, turnips and carrot. Transfer the mixture to a colander. Using large handfuls, squeeze out as much excess moisture as you can. Transfer to a large bowl. Stir in the onion/mushroom mixture, stirring until it is well distributed. Stir in the eggs and matzah meal until well mixed.

Remove the casserole from the oven. Carefully swirl the pan so that the oil coats the side of the casserole (or use a brush to do this). Transfer the potato mixture evenly into the pan. Bake in the centre of the preheated oven until golden and cooked throughout, 55 to 60 minutes. Serves 8 ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A new take on cantorial music for all tastes

Beth Sholom Synagogue Cantor Eric Moses and the cover of Crossroads, below.

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Beth Sholom Synagogue Cantor Eric Moses is behind two musical endeavours he hopes will resonate with fans of both traditional and contemporary music.

About a year after healing from his successful vocal surgery, Cantor Moses produced a musical album called Crossroads. Although this is the third album he's released, he said Crossroads is different from anything he's done before.

Moses teamed up with the Ruach Singers, an a cappella group that Beth Sholom incorporated into its Shabbat morning services once a month, in an attempt to attract a younger demographic to the shul.

"It's a fusion of the old and the new, and it's meant to inspire a new generation. I think every religion is looking for ways to engage people, and we don't want to be complacent and think that if we just keep doing the same thing year after year, week after week, people are going to keep coming. We've relied on that for too long and we need to show people a reason to come that inspires them. I'm not saying this is the end all and be all and the one answer for everybody, but if we find multiple ways to inspire people, then we have a shot at the future generation of Jews," Moses said.

"I was not a believer in the beginning. But it's a really good, unique sound, and it's amazing – people love it. We get calls from people who book their bar mitzvahs three years in advance... They're calling and asking for the Ruach Singers too... It's really taken off with people. That's why we said we have to do an album and put it out there so people can enjoy it and get to know the tunes."

> These are all guys in their 40s, including the chief cantor of the Israeli army, Shai Abramson.

Moses said he collaborated with the Ruach Singers on the album, which was launched on Erev Purim, to create "a new sound set to traditional texts and melodies."

"Crossroads reflects the vision of blending the old and the new to create a deeply soulful experience down to the core of our tradition," he said.

Moses praised the Ruach Singers for their beat-boxing talent, or "mimicking instrument sounds or different sounds that create the experience as if you're almost hearing a band... J-M Erlendson, the beat boxer, is like a band in and of himself."

In what he called a "completely different experience," Moses spoke about the April 6 concert he is organizing and promoting, called the World's Greatest Cantors Concert, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"One of my passions is traditional chazzanut, and that's something that Toronto has truly been a leader in... This is a way to showcase something that I think is really important and nostalgically important and a part of the Jewish music of Toronto," he said.

He said this is the third time he's run a similar event, but in the past, he has hosted the generation of chazzanim who are older than him.

"This time they are all my generation... These are all guys in their 40s, including the chief cantor of the Israeli army, Shai Abramson. It was a challenging feat to get him to be here because of his many responsibilities in Israel, but we're happy to be able to have him," he said.

Seven of the best-known cantors from Canada, the United States and Israel will be in Toronto, as well as Israeli conductor Eli Jaffe, who will be backed by the 50-piece Greater Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra.

"What's unique about this new brand of cantors is that they're out there... for example, Yaakov Lemmer. You look at him and he looks like he stepped right out of the shtetl because of the way he dresses. But he sang the U.S. national anthem on the sixth night of Chanukah at the Barclays Center, at the basketball game between the Brooklyn Nets and Detroit Pistons. And he sounded like a total pop singer. He belted out the Star Spangled Banner. You'd never think this guy sang cantorial music," he said.

"This is the first time in at least two to three years that we have a really major cantorial concert... I've never embarked on one this large."

Toronto actor/singer tackles a different kind of role

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the biggest stage role of his career, actor Stephen Joffe plays the dysfunctional boyfriend of an intellectually disabled woman, in a remount of The Crackwalker.

The play is a dark portrait of a group of marginalized people living in 1970s Kingston, Ont., where its author, Judith Thompson, was once a social worker.

Joffe, 24, a 2012 graduate of the National Theatre School, said the role of Alan, Theresa's boyfriend, is older than he's used to playing. "With my face and body, I generally get cast younger than I am."

Joffe described his character as a guy who's lived at the bottom of the pecking order. "He may have been born with a touch of fetal alcohol syndrome. Definitely a very difficult childhood. Not a good family and a lot of abuse," Joffe said. "As the play develops, he starts to struggle very aggressively with mental illness. Really, what he's trying to do is to achieve some sort of peace and happiness in his life. Unfortunately, we're in a system that continues to push the low even further down."

Preparing for the role, Joffe was curious about the response to The Crackwalker when it premiered in Toronto in 1980. He found critics and others referred to the play's characters – including Alan and Theresa's friends Sandy and Joe, as well as The Crackwalker, a homeless First Nations man – as bottom feeders or bottom dwellers.

"It's just simply not true," Joffe said. "These are human beings who are products of their environment."

The play is no less relevant today, he reflected. "These people still exist, and we still have this aggressive tendency to ignore them or dehumanize them and to separate them from ourselves," he said. "We have a duty not to look away, no matter how much it may be scary to see what we created, a mirror of ourselves. We have a responsibility to watch."

Along with acting on stage and in films – Joffe starred in the 2013 short, The Path, a social satire on consumerism – he's tried his hand at playwriting. Two plays he submitted to recent competitions proved to be winners. He came first in the 2013 Panfish New Play Contest, for Offers of Home, in which he explores homelessness, and he won the 2013 Theatre in the Ruff New Play Contest with The Cocoa Stand, a parable about capitalism.

Joffe also plays mandolin and sings in the award-winning band, the Birds of Bellwoods. An energetic folk ensemble whose harmonies soar, the group won a 2015 Toronto Independent Music Award in the best folk or roots category.

Sky, a tragic song filled with regrets about lost friendship, on the Birds' EP, The Fifth, was a finalist in the 2015 John Lennon Songwriting Competition. The group shares songwriting duties. Joffe often begins the process by coming up with a basic melody and a lyric, inspired by an experience that is greater than he is able to let go of.

"It's like an emotional fire hydrant," he said. The Birds of Bellwoods will release a single in the next month or two and a full-length album is in the works. Joffe sees himself as a performer more than as an actor or a musician. He aims to engage an audience in two-way communication, whether he's on stage or with the Birds of Bellwoods at a club.

"I get up and open my heart with the hopes that other people will open theirs as well," he said. "And that we can communicate and that we can recognize each other."

The Crackwalker, directed by Thompson, runs at Factory Theatre until April 10. For tickets, visit www.factorytheatre.ca. For more information about Joffe's band, visit www.birdsofbellwoods.com. ■

Egyptian myth subject of Toronto writer's debut opera

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Sharon Singer has always been fascinated by ancient Egypt. That's part of the reason she wrote Isis and Osiris, God of Egypt, an opera about the timeless Egyptian myth and love story.

Singer, who's a Toronto-based writer, poet, spoken word artist and now librettist, has worked for a number of years to put Isis and Osiris on stage and in the hands of a talented group of singers. Now, her two-hour-long opera will finally have its world premiere on April 1 at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts.

"This opera is my baby so this is giving birth," she says of the long process.

While she took care of the words, renowned Canadian composer Peter-Anthony Togni wrote all of the music. Singer describes their relationship as a collaborative one; they often work together, both in person and via Skype because Togni lives in Halifax.

Singer, however, penned the entire opera before Togni even added the music. Although, she would often sing her libretto (script) aloud to make sure it sounded melodic.

Sharon Singer

"Peter never heard what I sang, luckily," says Singer with a laugh. "And I had no idea what he was going to do with it. But he said that it was the libretto that inspired the music because he was very charmed by it."

Togni's score is quite contemporary. And that's intentional, Singer says. She says the opera itself conveys modern day themes, despite the fact that it's rooted in a story from millenniums ago.

> One of the things you realize in watching this is that human beings have not changed.

"One of the things you realize in watching this is that human beings have not changed," she says. In the Isis and Osiris myth, Osiris (sung by Michael Barrett) is the king of Egypt who rules along with his wife Isis (sung by Lucia Cesaroni). Osiris' brother Seth (sung by Michael Nyby) murders him out of jealousy and Isis goes on a journey to bring him back to life.

The opera explores timeless themes of love, hate and sibling rivalry. "There's a line in the opera when Isis says to Osiris, 'thousands cannot die for one man's lust for power,'" says Singer. "And we read this in the newspaper every day."

There's clearly more to this opera than just beautiful music. Dignitaries from Egypt, for instance, will be attending the world premiere as Singer hopes to inspire cross-cultural understanding.

Part of the reason why ancient Egypt captivated her in the first place, she says, is because of the Jewish people's biblical history there, especially during the time of Joseph.

As she brings that passion to life, she's also accomplishing another goal. Singer's never written an opera before, but back in the mid-1990s, she started putting music behind her spoken word pieces. One time, she heard soprano Doreen Taylor-Claxton sing her poetry. She was hooked. "I was so thrilled that I just wanted to do a bigger project," she says.

And now after years of putting the two together, her love of music, words and of course, ancient Egypt will finally take centre stage. ■

Walking Dead star to reprise her Golda Meir role

DAVID COLLIN
dcollin@thecjn.ca

American actor Tovah Feldshuh who just wowed TV audiences with her thrilling role on AMC's The Walking Dead will reprise her role as Golda Meir in Golda's Balcony in June.

Feldshuh says the show mixes humour and history. "You can get an education about the 1973 Yom Kippur war, it's phenomenal, it has humour, what Jewish person doesn't love a good laugh, are you kidding me?" says Feldshuh.

Feldshuh was in Toronto recently, appearing at Fan Expo Canada's Toronto Comicon, a smaller-scaled version of the annual mega-con held at the Metro Toronto Convention Center in September. Between greeting fans of her work on The Walking Dead and for her recent adjunct role as Naomi Bunch in Rachel Bloom and Aline Brosh McKenna's award winning musical comedy Crazy Ex-Girlfriend Feldshuh signed autographs and posed for photos.

Feldshuh played Deanna Monroe, the leader of the safe-haven Alexandria, in the popular TV show based in a zombie-over-run post-apocalyptic world for 12 episodes in seasons 5 and 6. Asked why the award-winning The Walking Dead has consistently been a top-rated show, Feldshuh said the show is more about the relationships between those that remain alive amidst the hordes of undead "walkers" (the survivors' name for the zombies).

Tovah Feldshuh

"We're all going to die, we want to know how to live out the years in our body," Feldshuh said. "How do we live in a sea of opposition and a sea of threat?"

> Just give me a great part and I'll show up

Feldshuh drew parallels of the environment her character's struggles in to maintain a sense of culture and decency to that of the concentration camps of World War II and any country where its people are threatened with genocide.

Feldshuh loves stories about time travel and said if offered a part in the period series Outlander, she would kill for the chance to get dressed up in costume from days gone by. "If you participate in projects that remind you of your childhood then you too can go back in time."

In a sense Feldshuh continues to do just that each time she returns to a musical. "Just give me a great part and I'll show up," she told The CJN.

Parts have always been offered to her. The 62-year-old-actress, who has been thrilling audiences on stage, screen and television for over four decades said that "age is irrelevant."

She said all directors want to know is if you can play the part. She joked, though that, "I may have to write my own series to give myself a starring role and one in which I can't be killed off."

After her Broadway debut alongside Canadian legend Christopher Plummer in the short-lived 1973 musical Cyrano, in 1975 Feldshuh secured the title role in Yentl both on and off Broadway. She then became internationally recognized for her role as Helena Slomova in the 1978 mini-series Holocaust.

In 2003, Feldshuh starred in Golda's Balcony delivering over 500 performances and winning the Drama Desk Award for outstanding solo performance. The show set a record as the longest-running one-woman play in Broadway history in 2005. ■

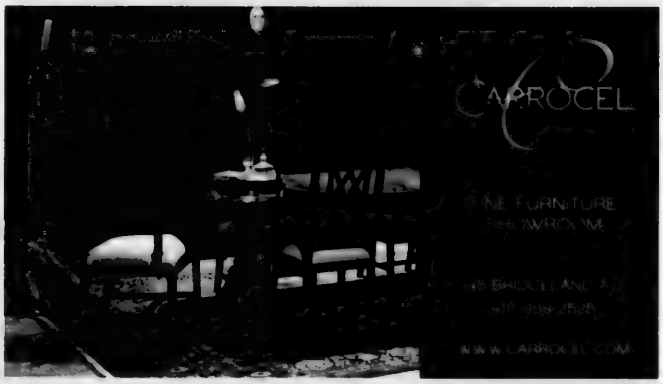
KEEPING JEWS JEWISH



A snapshot of a lost prewar Polish Jewish community

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the summer of 1938, the author's American grandparents, David and Liza Kurtz, took a six-week European vacation that included a brief visit to a Polish town, where David shot three minutes of footage – mostly in colour, which was rare for that day – with a 16mm camera.

In 2009, more than 70 years later, Glenn Kurtz discovered the film in a dented aluminum canister in a closet in his parents' home in Florida. But it had deteriorated so badly – having "shrunk, curled on itself, and fused into a single, hockey-puck-like mass" – that it could not be projected. Fortunately, some of the images had been transferred to videotape, and when Kurtz saw them, he was amazed and transfixed: he knew the film was important, and that it had to be preserved.

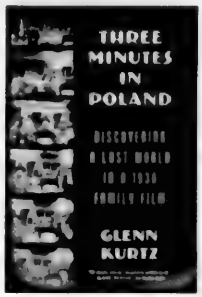
The film showed a vibrant Jewish community in a Polish town in August of 1938, just three months before Kristallnacht and one year before the onset of the war. But what town? Family sources insisted it was Berezne, his grandmother's ancestral shtetl, but Kurtz had growing suspicions it might be his grandfather's ancestral shtetl of Nasielsk. In any case, no one could positively recognize any of the buildings depicted in the crowded town square, abuzz with life.

It was only after he donated the footage to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum – which excitedly declared it to be "unique" – that Kurtz solved the mystery by finding an old photograph of the Nasielsk synagogue, identical to the synagogue that appears in the film.

Further confirmation that the town was indeed Nasielsk came after the film was posted online and the son and grandchild of octogenarian Maurice Chandler spotted him in the film as a sprightly 13-year-old boy wearing a cap. His family told Chandler, born in 1924 and one of relatively few Jews from Nasielsk to survive the Holocaust, that "you're in a sea of ghosts."

That's a riveting moment in the increasingly dramatic story of how the obsessive Kurtz strives to provide context and identity to the rich, lost and initially anonymous world that has been preserved in those three extraordinary – yet terribly ordinary – minutes of film. The random images of the townsfolk preserved on film – a crowd in the street, workers in ragged clothes, religious men in long black overcoats, women in kerchiefs, a procession leaving a synagogue – are laden with dramatic irony, since all seem blissfully unaware that their world is soon to be turned upside down and destroyed.

As he endeavours to restore memory, identity and dignity to nameless faces,



Three Minutes in Poland: Discovering a Lost World in a 1938 Family Film, by Glenn Kurtz
Farrar, Straus and Giroux

Kurtz travels across the United States and visits Canada, England, Poland and Israel; he also visits cemeteries, some in decrepit condition, and delves into archives, basements and attics. He eventually finds seven survivors from Nasielsk, including two who appear in the film as children.

Much of these discoveries could not have been made without the Internet; as poet Paul Simon once wrote, we live in an "age of miracles and wonders," however overshadowed it may be by countervailing darkness. Ultimately, through a combination of diligence and luck, Kurtz succeeds in restoring a vibrant picture of Nasielsk's Jewish community – at least that part of it recalled by a chance group of survivors consulted some 70 years after the devastation.

"Nasielsk survives only in memory," the author writes. "But the Nasielsk that exists in memory now is the chance artifact of those who happened to live longest. The memories themselves are equally artifacts of a ruthless process of selection, what is left over after 75 years of forgetting, suppressing, reworking, and smoothing out through repetition."

Kurtz's narrative is easily a quest, comparable to such memorable works as Theo Richmond's Konin: A Quest (1995), Daniel Mendelsohn's The Lost: A Search for Six of Six Million (2006) and Edmund de Waal's The Hare with Amber Eyes (2010). An attempt to celebrate the life of a Jewish community obliterated by the Nazis, Three Minutes in Poland is as much about the journey as the destination. The story is well written and gripping.

Wait Time: A Memoir of Cancer
by Kenneth Sherman
Wilfrid Laurier University Press

Toronto poet and essayist Kenneth Sherman chronicles another sort of journey – one that began when he was diagnosed with cancer. Sherman has already demonstrated through his various volumes of essays and poetry that he is an astute and perceptive wordsmith, and it may have been therapeutic for him to bring this rare talent into play during this deeply distressing time.

Like Poe's Descent Into the Maelstrom, Sherman combines dispassion with horror as he intelligently assesses the morass of doctors, nurses, hospitals, medical machinery, schedules, procedures and bureaucracy into which he has stumbled. Most agonizing of all, however, is the wait time for medical appointments as the deadly poison festers within. Like many a patient, Sherman quickly learns how to use his connections and otherwise work the system to improve the sometimes indifferent level of medical care available to many of us.

Beyond conquering any physical pain (of which there is little), Sherman soon discovers that controlling his own fears and morbid thoughts will also be a central challenge. Knowledge of a potentially deadly disease can have a sharp psychological effect on a person, he observes.

"It suddenly occurs to me that while I have a fairly realistic take on the odds, I, like any cancer patient, am hoping for a lucky break," he writes. "I am holding onto the notion that I am special – that I, above all the other poor patients who wait with me for their names to be called, deserve a reprieve. One of the big shocks in getting sick is to acknowledge that you are, after all, common flesh. Susceptible and mortal. Of course you've always known that, but knowing and accepting are two different things."

There is also much positive advice that the author shares with those who may be facing a similar health crisis; and yes, there is light at the end of this particular tunnel. ■

Two show-biz cousins star in biblical-based Two by Two

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Judy Gans and Julie Lennick, cousins with a shared show-biz legacy, have roles in a new production of Richard Rodgers' Two by Two, based on the biblical story of Noah's Ark.

Both women have deep roots in the Canadian entertainment industry, with family members who performed on and wrote for radio, television and the stage, beginning in the 1930s.

Lennick's mother, Sylvia, made her most famous appearance on The Ed Sullivan Show in May 1958, as a member of Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster's troupe. In a skit called Rinse the Blood Off My Toga, Wayne, as a private eye, tries to finger Marcus Brutus, played by Shuster, for the murder of Julius Caesar. Playing the widow, Sylvia cries out, in a Bronx accent, "I told him, Julie don't go." Sylvia's line got a lot of laughs, but she rarely appeared with Wayne and Shuster after that. "She was getting all the laughs, and Wayne and Shuster didn't use her so much," her daughter said.

Lennick was born after her mother rushed to the hospital from a live broadcast of the CBC radio show At Home with the Lennicks. Sylvia's husband, Ben, wrote the scripts for the mid-1950s comedy show.

Julie Lennick's parents founded a theatre company in 1930s, which they resurrected in the 1960s, to give themselves and other actors work. Sylvia, who died in 2012, worked for more than a half century.

Julie Lennick, left, and Judy Gans have deep roots in the Canadian entertainment industry.

"Everybody else had parents – the mother stayed home and the father went to work. And I thought, Why can't we be that? Why doesn't my father put on a suit and go to work, get a job?" Lennick said wryly.

She and her cousin grew close as children while they were taking acting classes from Judy's mother (and Sylvia's sister), Geri, in the basement of Judy's house. Lennick decided she wanted to sing after she heard Judy perform in a show, so her parents sent her for lessons with Charles Jordan, singer-songwriter Marc Jordan's father.

Despite their youth, Geri, who had been a student at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in the 1940s when it was run by legendary acting teacher Sanford Meisner, taught her students method acting, improv and the basics of mime. Now 89, Geri is still active in local theatre. Two of her musicals, based on the stories of Rapunzel and Cinderella, were presented at recent Toronto Fringe Festivals.

Lennick, a community theatre veteran, introduced her cousin to community theatre in the early 1980s. "Once I got into it, it was an amazing journey," Judy Gans said.

The cousins interacted on stage together for the first time as adults in a production of Grease in 1990. Since then, Gans and Lennick have appeared on stage together in productions of Oliver, Damn Yankees, The Music Man and Gypsy.

In Two by Two, presented by the Civic Light-Opera Company, Lennick, who has the role of Noah's wife, comedically spars with her malcontented daughter-in-law, Leah, played by her cousin, Gans.

> I thought, 'Why can't we be that? Why doesn't my father put on a suit and go to work, get a job?'

Two by Two, with music by Rodgers and lyrics by Martin Charnin, was first presented on Broadway in 1970. It's a modern retelling of Noah's preparation for the Great Flood and its aftermath and includes contemporary themes, among them the devastation of the environment. The musical's story was based on Clifford Odets' final play, The Flowering Peach, which depicted Noah's family as a lower-middle-class Jewish family from the Bronx. ■

The Civic Light-Opera Company's production of Two by Two features director Joe Cascone as Noah. Along with Gans and Lennick, the cast includes Andrew Long, David Haines, Eric Botosan, Lindsay Burrows and Katie Richardson. For tickets to Two by Two at the Zion Cultural Centre from April 6 to 17, visit www.civiclightoperacompany.com or call the box office at 416-755-1717.

Purim vs. Halloween: the holiday grudge match

Chaimie and Leizer

With the festival of Purim just past, it's worth analyzing what sort of a role it plays within the landscape of the holidays and rituals of modern secular society. In other words, does Purim put Halloween to shame, or are we a shande fun di goyim when it comes to revelry?

Heroes: Does Halloween even have a hero? Who? Jack-O-Lantern? A headless horseman? A seedless pumpkin? There's really no one to truly call a role model for the kids. On the other hand, with Purim you've got two great heroes – Esther, a frickin' Queen (and to get chosen as a Jew in that Iranian court – can you say Oh My Dinejad?) and someone who risks her life for her people (including fasting – I mean, we're talking serious sacrifice here), and of course Uncle Morty. Sure, he didn't go up to old Achashverosh himself, but this guy was like a medieval Mossad with picking up that intel like that. This is a clear two-headed no-brainer vs. a guy without even a head and certainly no yiddishn kop.
Winner: Purim

Costumes: Halloween is easy because you can always rely on Shopper's or Pharmaprix, and entire stores literally open up weeks before to get people dressed up. (Of course, when UNICEF asks for clothes for actual needy people, no one's giving, but hey, who are we to judge?) Purim requires a bit more resourcefulness – somebody's got some pipe cleaners here and there, Zaide's got an old shmatte, Bubbie has an old tiara, and boom, you're Kim Kardashian, or Vashti. Or both! (Cotton balls also make for cheap beards, for you Mordechai wannabes.)
Winner: Halloween for options. Purim for resourcefulness.

Haunted Houses: The only thing we have that's close is Hillel House. Meanwhile, the goyim are working on their houses for up to one week turning them into quasi-cemeteries. Whoever is asking how it is that the Jews have gotten ahead should really be asking how can non-Jews recapture their lost productivity on that one week of mindless faux-cemetery construction for the enjoyment of strangers, children and strange children?
Winner: Halloween
Real Winner: The Jews

Horror movies: There isn't a Purim horror movie yet, though by all means there should be, with such juicy potential names as They Came from Shushan, He Who Shall Not Be Named and – why not – Nightmare on Chelm Street.
Winner: Halloween

Music: Halloween has no good songs except maybe Monster Mash and Thriller. Meantime, we've got some great Purim songs. Wait, do we? Where are the Purim classics? Who was on that? Yossi, you had one job to do…
Winner: Tie - both could use a little Irving Berlin treatment.

Food: Look, the average person will tell you that Halloween is superior, what with the Tootsie Rolls, the unlimited mini chocolate bars, yada yada yada. But let us say this about that: first, the risk of a razor blade in a hamentash is surprisingly low (generally our enemies enjoy holding the blades when wielding them against us – the whole remote blade thing is very inauthentic to them). Second, if you're into opiates, Purim absolutely destroys on this front, providing just enough poppy to make you fail a drug test, but not enough to overdose. Third, if you ate nothing but hamentashen, you would get fat off of food made with love. If you ate nothing but Halloween candy, you would get fat off of food made with partially hydrogenated olive oil. And to the best of our knowledge, the Beatles didn't sing the classic All You Need is Partially Hydrogenated Vegetable Oil.
Winner: Purim

Alcohol: In absolute terms, yes, there is literally more alcohol flowing on Halloween than there is on Purim. But on a per kop-ita basis (i.e. how much alcohol is in a Jewish head), there is way more shikur/kop on Purim. After all, the rabbis mandate that you have to drink until you don't know right from wrong, or if you're in Toronto, Wright from Yonge. Hey, we may not follow our rabbis on anything, but on this particular mitzvah, we will solemnly oblige.
Winner: Purim

So there you have it. While Halloween may be good for those interested in a Hallows Evening of ghouls, ghosts and child obesity, we're perfectly happy celebrating dodging real horrors, like, we dunno, state-mandated genocide. L'chaim, to life – literally! ■

Chaimie and Leizer are Jamie Elman and Eli Batalion, co-creators of the world's first online Yiddish sitcom YidLife Crisis.

Israeli theatre company comes to Toronto

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Though translated to English and adapted to make sense to local audiences, the plays featured by the North American branch of the Aspaklaria Jewish Repertory Theatre Company portray characters that feel somehow Israeli.

"Our actors will tell me that Canadian theatre characters don't behave or respond the way ours do. There's something about the Middle Eastern temperament – the directness, the warmth – that comes across strongly in our writing," said Joseph Fackenheim, 36, artistic director of the Israeli theatre company's new Canadian iteration, which is based in Toronto.

Aspaklaria was founded in Jerusalem in 2001 by Rabbi Hagay Lober and given repertory status by the Israeli Ministry of Culture. Its mandate is to spread Jewish themes and culture in Israel and internationally.

Nine months ago, Aspaklaria's new North American branch set up shop in Toronto with an aim to give local audiences – both Jewish and not – an eye into Israeli and Jewish ways of life.

On April 3, Aspaklaria will hold its inaugural event at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, with a reception followed by the Canadian debut performance of the company's flagship play for the season, The Odds.

Written by Ayelet Scheinberg and Rabbi Lober, The Odds has been running successfully in Israel for the past six years.

It's a dramatic comedy about a couple's therapist who decides to hold a workshop exclusively for men to work out their relationship problems.

Three men attend, and the play follows the emotional and humorous journey that unfolds as they work with the therapist to unpack their marital issues.

"A few of the characters are Jewish and their journey is very much inflected by their Jewishness. Overall, I think the outlook on relationships presented in the play is very Jewish," explained Fackenheim, who himself is one of Aspaklaria's four company actors, and who plays a part in The Odds.

Currently working and rehearsing out of Fackenheim's Toronto home, the company has four professional actors – three of whom, including Fackenheim, are Jewish, and one who isn't – and currently has a repertoire of three plays it's looking to show first in Toronto and eventually, across North America.

All three – in addition to The Odds, there's Dead End, which will run in Toronto later this year and Tom – have been adapted from Israeli scripts, and were well-received in Israel, said Fackenheim, who also directs and produces the shows, and did some of the writing adaptation and translation for The Odds.

Aspaklaria founder Rabbi Hagay Lober, right, with Knesset speaker Yuli Edelstein, one of the fans of the Israeli theatre company.

> There's something about the Middle Eastern temperament that comes across strongly in our writing.
> Artistic director Joseph Fackenheim

Aspaklaria's North American branch has no home theatre venue, but will travel "wherever and whenever we're booked," said Fackenheim.

He said that the company's plays have been "localized" in the sense that a scene that originally took place in Israel's Zion Square might be changed to, say, Central Park.

Fackenheim stressed that Aspaklaria wants to appeal to diverse audiences and "hold up a new window on Israeli culture so people in North America can see aspects of Israel they wouldn't otherwise in the media."

The company hopes to eventually commission and write fresh material here.

Fackenheim, who was born in Canada but largely grew up in Israel, is the son of the late Emil Fackenheim, who was a Reform rabbi in Hamilton and subsequently a professor of philosophy at the University of Toronto.

"Part of me is Israeli and part of me is Canadian," he said. "It's important to me that I know Israel from the inside and am able to present its multifaceted outlook to North American audiences," Fackenheim said.

Part of what makes Aspaklaria unique is that it was founded by the Orthodox Rabbi Lober, who attended acting school after receiving ordination in order to improve his sermonizing skills.

The company observes Halachah – no performances are held on Shabbat – and the content is, Fackenheim said, "interesting and scintillating without going to places of sex or vulgarity." This allows them to perform for audiences of any religion.

Further, Fackenheim said, "adherence to certain rules is something that enables us to express ourselves artistically in new and interesting ways. It frees, rather than hinders, us." ■

Changing the face of "Canada's High Street"

The Leo Baeck Day School (TLBDS) put together a unique, engaging event, bringing together leading developers Adam Paul, president and CEO of First Capital Realty, Sam Mizrahi, president of Mizrahi Developments, and David Speigel, president and COO of Metropia. Each presented current projects that are revitalizing and re-imagining Toronto's historic Bloor/Yorkville district. The guests, donors to TLBDS, took full advantage of the opportunity to ask the developers questions about their vision and the area's business opportunities. All enjoyed hearing the powerful message from Eric Petersiel, head of The Leo Baeck Day School, on how their support is making a difference to Jewish education in Canada.

MARRIED WITH KIDS

In defence of homemade mishloach manot

Lauren Kramer

One of my favourite things about Purim is opening the front door to find little gift boxes outside. They're usually very homemade, but that's precisely their charm.

Inside, misshapen hamantashen nestle against each other, their fillings burbling out of their careful folds. There's fruit, a few herbal tea bags, sometimes a small cake and candy thrown haphazardly into the mix. A handwritten little note will say, "Happy Purim!" And the holiday certainly feels like a happy one when you find thoughtful, homemade little gifts at your door. They add a taste of someone else's kitchen to your day and a fun, a whimsical touch to this noisy, messy Jewish holiday. No sooner are the gifts in the kitchen than my kids will bicker over the spoils, specifically over who gets the candy and chocolate cake. Those hamantashen are usually the last to go.

Assembling mishloach manot can be quite a workout. I know because most years I create a few of my own, Googling for innovative additions to my boxes and spending hours on my sewing machine so I can add a homemade dishcloth or pot holder. I love finding innovative, useful containers for the mishloach manot, and fight to get the perfect consistency on my pastry so my hamantashen look like they're intended to. It's a battle I consistently lose, and the words "DO NOT MAKE" are scrawled across most of my recipes for this peculiar pastry. Still, it's Purim, and for tradition's sake, I feel like I have to keep trying.

By the time my mishloach manot are done they're emphatically homemade, but everything about their appearance says, "I took time and effort to put this together."

To me, that's the essence of what a meaningful gift should be. No one who makes mishloach manot in her or his kitchen is striving for a professional gift basket because that's not what it's about. Homemade means personal touches, loving thoughtfulness and imperfections aplenty. Professional, by contrast, means "went to the store and forked over money." Sure, professional looks better – but homemade somehow feels nicer. To me, at any rate.

> Homemade means personal touches, loving thoughtfulness and imperfections aplenty.

The Jewish schools in my area are forever fundraising, and over the years, their mishloach manot fundraiser has gathered impetus. It's a smart scheme for the schools: you let them know the names and addresses of the families to whom you want to send Purim gifts. You pay a set amount and they do the rest, assembling hundreds of professional looking baskets that contain store-made hamantashen, a few Hershey's kisses and a ceramic mug or other kitchen accoutrement that will likely gather dust before landing in the trash or the thrift store. For the gift-giver, the only requirement to participate is reading off the digits on their credit card. But recipients get just one little box, no matter how many families decided to send a gift. One box containing not even a whiff of anything homemade. Kind of a raw deal, when you think about it.

So bring back the home-crafted mishloach manot, I say. They don't need to take hours or cost huge amounts to assemble, and they give the gift-giver an opportunity to be creative, to rally the kids for a baking session in the kitchen and to initiate cute themed baskets, from cookies and milk to OJ and muesli. You don't have to be a culinary whiz to do this. The fun is in assembling a collection of goodies, packaging them together and personally delivering them to people you care about.

Professional mishloach manot are like the gift cards or cheques you get on your birthday. They say "money," but not personal effort, deliberation or thoughtfulness. And there's something about those three attributes taken together that makes a recipient feel special, chosen and loved – and not just on Purim. ■

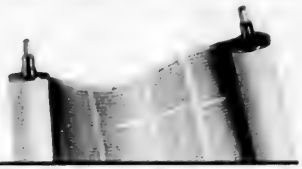
Shmini | Leviticus 9:1-11:47



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains how the act of teaching can help diminish our pain and anguish
Rabbi Denise Handlarski contemplates the relationship between the sacred and the profane
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says serving God is not enough -- we must do so with joy

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

What do we expect from our leaders? As we observe the presidential contest in the United States, and as we consider leadership in our own country and communities, this is a question we frequently ask ourselves.

In our parshah, Aaron the high priest experiences the tragic loss of two of his sons. Immediately following this, God speaks directly to Aaron and offers not words of solace, but specific instructions.

God prohibits Aaron and other priests from drinking wine before entering the Tent of Meeting. The rabbis have suggested that this warning is a way of informing Aaron about the sin of his sons.

Is this what Aaron really needs to hear right now?

This matter-of-fact law is followed by two points that seem to serve as a directive to Aaron. God says: "For you must distinguish between the sacred and the profane… and you must teach the Israelites all the laws which the Lord has imparted to them through Moses" (Leviticus, 10:10-11).

Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin, in his 19th-century commentary Ha'amek Davar, explains that this instruction was designed to encourage Aaron to teach others. In doing so, Aaron would experience joy and see his anguish and pain diminished.

In tragic situations, seldom are there effective words of comfort. However, God does provide a model of comfort here in giving Aaron direction and purpose at a very difficult time.

Aaron is reminded of his purpose, which is to understand what is holy, what is profane – and, most poignantly, to teach this distinction to others. This act of reaching out – and finding a higher purpose in a painful life – is the ultimate comfort for a bereaved leader. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

In Shmini, Aaron is told that the job of the priests is to "distinguish between the sacred and the profane." We have a weekly way of distinguishing between these if we mark Shabbat. Shabbat is a special, sacred time when we remember to rest, to breathe. At the close of Shabbat, we celebrate Havdallah, meaning separation. It is time to mark the transition between the sacred time of Shabbat and the ordinary time of the week.

Some see Havdallah as more of a joining than a separation – we bring the sacredness into the rest of the week by beginning the week with the lovely rituals of lighting interwoven candles, singing songs and smelling spices. Although distinctions are important, so are connections. There are extraordinary aspects to our ordinary weeks and lives.

This parshah is concerned with purity laws. The rules for kashrut are laid out, and so is the commandment to go to the mikvah (ritual bath). The parshah asks us to consider what we put into our bodies and how we take care of our bodies. For many of us, our thinking about these issues has moved from purity to process, from commandment to consciousness.

We need not follow all of the laws of kashrut to take the invitation to consider the ethics of our eating, for example. The rules for mikvah use concerning women are inherently sexist, but many women have reclaimed the mikvah as a sacred women-only time and space for reflection and relaxation.

There must be a division between the sacred and the everyday for us to be able to distinguish between them. But there is also room to bring a little more of what is sacred to us, and what is highest in our consciousness and heart, into our daily practices. Shmini asks us to contemplate both the separation and the joining. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is spiritual leader of Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

In this week's parshah, we are told how the Jews rejoiced after seeing that their sacrifices were accepted. From this we learn that just serving God is not enough.

We must do it with joy. Joy breaks barriers. I saw this recently at the wedding of my niece from Brazil who married someone from New York. It was my parents' first grandchild to get married. The joy was real and immense. Happy people find it easier to overcome their difficulties.

This Shabbat we bless the month of Nisan, in which we have the festival of Pesach, which involves a lot of work. Cleaning one's home for Pesach is no simple task. Let's try to enjoy it while we're at it!

Besides our children helping us get the home ready, children have their own Pesach preparations. Our sages teach that when the Jews left Egypt, the children were the first to acknowledge God's miracles. To commemorate this, the children always begin the seder night with the Four Questions.

But when children ask the same questions every year, it shouldn't be a matter of rote. Each Pesach should be a new opportunity to discover better answers and reach a deeper understanding of the meaning of Pesach. Just as children come with questions and want to know the answers, parents (and grandparents) are expected to tell the children the answers. The text we use, the Haggadah, comes from the word "Vehigadeta," "and you shall tell your child."

May we have all the answers to all questions, and may we have the ultimate answer to our question of "how much longer must we endure this exile?" with the coming of Mashiach. The letters of the word Mashiach (in Hebrew) are the same as the letters of the word Yismach (he shall rejoice). In the merit of joy alone, we will merit to be redeemed! ■

Jewish groups, artists question Kushner booking

But Ari Weisberg, artistic director of Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre, said that while "I can't say I've read all [of Kushner's] plays – I don't have the patience for that – I will not produce any of his plays."

"I'm not censoring anybody [but] we always [staged] pro-Jewish, pro-Israel plays. That's our mandate," Weisberg said. Staging a play by Kushner would be "contrary to our mandate.

"Plays are not propaganda," he added. "We do bring up challenges and problems."

But he likened Kushner's work to My Name is Rachel Corrie, a play about an American activist killed by an Israeli bulldozer in the Gaza Strip in 2003.

In 2006, Toronto's Canadian Stage Company decided not to stage the play, a decision based on the work's merits rather than the political controversy that dogged it, the company said at the time.

"We have concerns about some of the factually incorrect comments that have been attributed to Mr. Kushner," said B'nai Brith Canada CEO Michael Mostyn.

"We would encourage the Koffler Centre to do its due diligence and ensure that in choosing speakers for events, the sensibilities of the greater Jewish community are taken into consideration." ■

Matthew Bronfman on his father's Jewish journey

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Matthew Bronfman, son of the late Canadian-born entrepreneur, philanthropist and Jewish leader Edgar Bronfman, will be in Toronto April 5 to speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation to mark the launch of his father's book, Why Be Jewish?

During his appearance, which will take place in conversation with Bernie Farber, Bronfman will discuss the book, which was finished by his father in 2013, just weeks before his death. The book details his father's personal Jewish journey, and despite his father's secularism, calls on disaffected Jewish youth to explore their heritage.

Bronfman spoke to The CJN about his father's book and the connection to Judaism that his father embraced later in his life, which did not include a belief in a string-pulling God.

Matthew Bronfman

Your father writes about his connection to Judaism, but makes it clear that his Judaism is not about a blind adherence to Halachah, and he rejects the idea of the traditional, biblical God.

He came to believe in godliness, that we find godliness in acts of human kindness, in tikkun olam, and his study was at the core of that. The more he studied, the more he learned, and the more he learned, the more he came to appreciate the values and the morals and the lifestyle in a way, and he found beauty in it.

It never made him believe in that anthropomorphic God – the guy with the white beard pulling strings. He never believed that if you did something bad, you'd go to hell and that if you were tremendous you were going to heaven. I think one of the things he loved was that on Yom Kippur, when you have to atone, you have to atone to a person. I don't mean to put Catholicism down, but it's not like you say three Hail Marys and you're absolved. This is about human relationships. Even if you look at the Ten Commandments, only the first three are about [a relationship with] man to God. Everything else is man to man. It is about human relations. That is one of the things he came to really love and appreciate about Judaism. One of the things he talked about all the time was that the religion forced you, implored you, to question. We see it in the four questions in the Passover seder. We see it in the way chevrutahs are set up. Everything is about questioning. It is not about blind faith. And over time, as he came to really understand that in a deep way, it gave him an enormous appreciation and love for the traditions and religion. Not in a godly way, but in a way of living.

> One of the things he talked about all the time was that the religion forced you, implored you, to question.

When he did start learning more and studying, did he make an effort to instil Jewish values in you and your siblings?

When he was 50, he became acting president of the World Jewish Congress, and I think in 1981, he became president of the WJC. Around that time, maybe it didn't happen until his 60s, he and Rabbi Israel Singer started doing more learning together.

We grew up devoid of religion in the house. We didn't light candles on Friday night, we were not Shabbat observant, no Hebrew school. I think it made a big difference in our lives. There was definitely a void there.

When he started studying, we were too old by that point. He certainly offered to share it. Much later in his life, maybe 65 or 70, I'm not sure when, he started doing a weekly Torah study in his office and whoever was in New York was always invited to join, but it was not required. Remember, he was 30 years older than I am, so if he was 65, I was already 35 years old. It's not like I was a kid in the house, so it was very different. I definitely came to it on my own, as did my brother Adam, but none of the other children did.

Do you see Judaism through the same lens?

I am probably a slightly greater believer that the Torah was in some way shape or form – if not actually written – delivered by God, inspired by something much greater than any human mind could ever have created.

I had a rabbi that I learned with in the early '90s who basically said, in a funny way, it doesn't really matter whether you believe it was written by God or written by the great prophets. These are still our stories from which we learn. As long as you're willing to learn from them, he's not going to argue with you about the author.

What was it that motivated your father to strengthen his connection to Judaism later in life and work toward instilling that same connection in younger Jews?

It was very much an evolutionary, natural process. The more he learned, the more he liked it and understood it and valued it, and realized how much he had missed as a young person, which inspired him to get involved with Hillel – I think he was the first international chair of Hillel – and to spend a huge amount of time on college campuses. His focus was on getting to people when they were younger so that they would have Jewish opportunities that he felt he had missed and he felt strongly about the fact that he didn't instill it in his children.

Can you tell me about your father's commitment to tikkun olam and the idea that people need to take things into their own hands to affect positive change?

I had the opportunity to travel with my dad a fair amount when he did his work with the World Jewish Congress. To see him actually taking action, doing things, it made a huge difference in my life. I think because he didn't believe in the guy with the white beard in the sky, he understood that one had to take action, and he often cited the quote, "We're not instructed to complete the work, but we're certainly not absolved from trying." That was something he lived by. If you're fortunate enough to have economic resources to do good work, you have an obligation. He really believed that.

Do you have an answer to the question, "Why be Jewish?"

I think his answer to it is the right one. If you take the time to study, you will learn what a beautiful and inspiring text we have to learn from and to guide us in terms of how to live our lives and how to live our lives in a more moral and ethical way and take care of those who are less fortunate, and it is all there.

As I said at his second memorial, a smaller one at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem – I said at the time that one of the things I love about Judaism is that all of our heroes, every single one of our heroes, was flawed. From Moses to Abraham, Jacob and Isaac, it doesn't matter. They were human. They were flawed. And my dad was flawed, but he was my hero. It's a living, real text that we can learn from for our everyday lives and learn how to be better and get through tough times and not to be grandiose in the good times.

When my dad was about 75, I was sitting with Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, and he was saying nice things about my dad, and you know, I'm very used to that. We've all heard it before. But he said, "No, no, no, Matthew. It's not because your father is a great philanthropist or because your father has done stuff for the World Jewish Congress. I'm talking about the fact that when your father was at an age when most people retired, he started to learn. And it was through his learning that he became the Jewish leader he was. That is why I admire him so much." ■

Dreyfus: From Devil's Island to Auschwitz

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

He was an innocent soldier caught in the greatest political convulsion since the French Revolution. Capt. Alfred Dreyfus was wrongly accused of spying for Germany, found guilty of treason in a secret trial, denied the right to examine the evidence against him, stripped of his rank in a humiliating ceremony and shipped to the lethal French penal colony of Devil's Island.

Dreyfus would become the lightning rod for an outpouring of venomous anti-Semitism that foreshadowed calamities to come. But in a revolt of conscience, there gathered under the French Tricolour men and women who seized the mace of honour and led a campaign worthy of the greatness of the soul of the nation. And it resulted in Dreyfus' exoneration 110 years ago in 1906.

In spite of all his trials and tribulations, for Dreyfus and his family, France remained the only country within which their deepest emotions were inextricably anchored. In this, they never wavered. This is precisely why at the age of 48, Dreyfus, although retired from the army, volunteered for combat in World War I as major of artillery. He even fought under Marshal Philippe Petain at Verdun and at the battle of the Chemin des Dames. For his valour, he was promoted to the rank of Officier de la Legion d'honneur in 1918.

His son Pierre also served France in Flanders Fields and received the Croix de Guerre. The family was devastated when Alfred's brother Jacques' sons, Maurice and Charles, fell in the Great War. Their brother Rene survived and became one of the most decorated French "Top Guns" of the war.

Dreyfus died in 1935 and was spared the chagrin and the sorrow of witnessing Vichy's collaboration with the Nazi Germany, during which many members of his family were arrested, handed over to the Gestapo and sent to concentration camps. Had he been alive when the deportation of French Jews started, his Legion d'honneur would not have shielded him from the flames of Nazi infernos.

His wife, Lucy, survived while hiding with the Sisters of Valence but died of a broken heart within months of her return to Paris in 1945, once she realized what had happened to her family. Two wars and her husband's ordeal had proved too much to bear for her mortal coil. The discovery that her favourite granddaughter, Madeleine, had perished in Auschwitz was the final stroke.

> Dreyfus would become the lightning rod for an outpouring of venomous anti Semitism that foreshadowed calamities to come.

Jean Pierre Reinach, the only grandson of Mathew Dreyfus, Alfred's brother, died when his parachute failed while attempting to land in France in 1942.

Reinach's brother-in law, Emmanuel Amar, left his wife and two daughters to join the resistance. He was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to Auschwitz together with the Grand Rabbi of Strasbourg in Convoy 62 in 1944.

Rene, the highly decorated flying ace of the World War I, was betrayed by his concierge and killed in Auschwitz. Rachel, Alfred's sister, who led a ferocious campaign for her brother with Marcel Proust, Emil Zola and Anatole France, simply could not bear the anguish of losing her only son, Julien, and died of despair. According to Michael Burns, author of Dreyfus: A Family Affair, 1789 - 1945 her diary entry for Dec.12, 1941 reads " two German soldiers came to arrest Julien as a hostage. It seems that 3,000 Jews have been rounded up today. Where will they take him?"

Amar's widow, Suzy, managed to survive in a prisoner's camp and would have died were it not for the help of a local priest and the Swiss consul. She waited for the return of her husband in vain. Alice, the widow of Leon Dreyfus, Alfred's elder brother, too, never came back from Auschwitz. ■

The world's first Jewish tartan, and Van Damme's 'spiritual' visit to Jerusalem

Scottish Jews get their own tartan

The first Jewish person recorded to live in Scotland may have arrived in 1691, but the country's Jewish community only last week got an official "kosher tartan" designed by Rabbi Mendel Jacobs – the only Scottish-born rabbi living in the country. "For over 300 years Scots Jews have waited for their own tartan and now here it is," he said. The tartan features blue and white to represent both the Scottish and Israeli flags, red for the traditional kiddush wine and gold to represent the Ark in the biblical Tabernacle. It has been officially approved and registered by the Scottish Tartans Authority.

Aye! We finally got our own tartan, matey!

Van Damme seeks spiritual guidance

Action star Jean-Claude Van Damme was in Israel last week looking for some "spiritual guidance" in the aftermath of the recent attacks in his hometown of Brussels, Rabbi Eyal Reiss told reporters. Van Damme reportedly visited a kabbalah centre in Safed after touring Jerusalem, where he posted a photo of himself to social media accompanied by the caption, "Shalom from Jerusalem, Israel!" However, after several anti-Israel comments Van Damme changed the caption to "Hello from Jerusalem."

The Associated Nazi Press?

German historian Harriet Scharnberg claims in a new study that the Associated Press formally co-operated with Hitler's Nazi regime. According to Scharnberg, the AP abided by the Schriftleitergesetz (Editor's Law), agreeing not to publish any material "calculated to weaken the strength of the Reich abroad or at home." The newswire service also hired reporters and photographers who worked for the Nazi propaganda ministry, Scharnberg alleges, noting that the AP was the only international news agency allowed to operate in Germany until the United States entered World War II in 1941. An AP spokesperson told the Guardian, "As we continue to research this matter, AP rejects any notion that it deliberately 'collaborated' with the Nazi regime." ■

Combating alcohol abuse

It was wonderful to read the Rabbi to Rabbi column's discussion of alcohol use and misuse in the Jewish community ("Is it OK to get drunk on Purim?" March 17).

As a social worker and certified addiction counsellor, I have had the privilege of working as a therapist and consultant on addictions in the Jewish community of Toronto for many years. I have seen our treatment of people who struggle with alcohol abuse move from isolation to connection and then to greater awareness in synagogue ritual and observances in our homes.

However, in noting that "religiously sanctioned alcoholism" still exists, the rabbis point out that there is much still to do. For some people, abstinence is the only safety net where alcohol is involved. They do not need to be ashamed.

The rabbis are correct in noting that we need to open up "education and moderation," but that is not enough. We need to do even more to support abstinence from alcohol as a viable choice and to include the risks associated with drinking in all educational efforts. Sadly, many Jewish alcoholics note that their invitation to problem drinking came at a seder or at Purim or at a kiddush.

I hope that with our growing sophistication and knowledge we increasingly will offer both choices and education that encourage our celebrations to be joyful in the fullest sense, that remove shame, and that allow all of us to be both safe and healthy.

Canada's role at the UN

The United Nations Human Rights Council recently appointed Canadian anti-Israel activist Michael Lynk as its special rapporteur on the issue of human rights in the Palestinian territories ("Dion asks UN to review nomination of anti-Israel prof," March 31).

Ironically, Lynk's appointment came one week after Prime Minister Justin Trudeau announced Canada's intention to seek a non-permanent seat on the UN Security Council. Canada's relationship with the Security Council, the Human Rights Council and other international agencies should be conditioned on the fundamental reform and de-politicization of those institutions, which have for decades allowed their important work to be hijacked by forces antithetical to the legitimacy, or, indeed existence, of a Jewish state.

Widening the debate

I could scarcely believe my eyes when I read Mira Sucharov's column that she actually believes the goals of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement are ending the occupation, instilling equality among Israeli citizens and allowing refugee return, rather than singling out Israel for the demonization, discrimination and destruction of the Jewish state. ("It's time to widen the debate on Israel and Palestine," March 24).

I certainly hope that she read Mordechai Ben-Dat's brilliant article on BDS right below hers ("The facts about Israel that BDS-ers don't want you to know").

Shelley Rothman-Benhaim

Columnist Mira Sucharov urges "the Jewish establishment to take seriously the perspective of those who oppose Zionism on intellectual and philosophical grounds."

In sum, she wishes to create a playpen for left-wing liberals to display their intellectual prowess by dissecting Israel from every direction in finding fault.

The idea that directing their attention to the plight of the truly underfed and suppressed peoples of the world would prove of greater human value is not their meat.

How mendacious it is to suggest that the separation barrier was not an act of self-defence but a desire to hem in Palestinians.

Lofty phrases such as "political discourse occurs in silos, attitudes tend to harden," are nothing but empty words.

The mainstream Jewish community is open to constructive dialogue. It is left-wing attempts to undermine Israel that are not welcome.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Purim, Pesach and the president

Donald Trump's presidential run mirrors the erosion of civility in society at large, and in the Jewish community too

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: As an American, I am watching with great interest and consternation as the election of a new president gets closer. I am alarmed at the surprising popularity of Donald Trump. Is it understandable that a large number of Americans have become disenchanted by the status quo, by the career politicians and all their double-speak? Yes, and that is part of Trump's appeal of this brash and aggressive anti-politician.

I'm quite concerned about what a Trump presidency may mean to the fabric of our society. We've seen a frightening erosion of civility in the public sphere over the last few years and Trump seems to be the living incarnation of this pent-up fury.

We're witnessing the same kind of rhetoric and blind allegiance to a charismatic leader that appeared in the 20th century with various despots, and these regimes never ended well for the common citizen. And yet, perhaps what America needs now is a strong leader who has the necessary vision and determination to secure the borders and destroy terrorism once and for all.

Rabbi Grushcow: Perhaps not surprisingly, you and I are not on exactly the same page in our political beliefs. But, like you, I am very concerned about the Trump campaign, and how easily charisma can turn into demagoguery. I am especially disheartened by what happened at the AIPAC convention, where thousands of Jews stood up and cheered as a candidate insulted a sitting president.

How have we reached this point, where those who support Israel are assumed to be entirely right wing? And is our memory so short that we don't relate to those minority groups Trump stereotypes and insults?

We live in difficult times, but that's true in every generation. The important question always is, how do we respond? Purim teaches us the importance of mustering our courage – as well as our sense of humour – as we work to undermine tyrants. Pesach reminds us of the Jewish conviction that we will move from slavery to freedom, and degradation to praise.

In our Reform prayer book, there is a line that reads, "We pray that we may live not by our fears but by our hopes, not by our words but by our deeds." The challenge is to live – and act, and vote – according to our hopes, rather than being drawn in by those who play to our fears.

Rabbi Korobkin: Part of Trump's attraction is that he is playing to people's fears, but it's not that simple. Terrorism is real, and it's happening all around us. The Islamic State (ISIS) is getting stronger by the day, and both the current U.S. president and the Canadian prime minister seem to be ignoring, or at least playing down, this very real threat.

It's great to live by our hopes, but we need to realize that evil still exists in the world and to fight that evil with every fibre of our being. And remember: in order to defeat evil, the Jews fought and killed Haman and thousands of others anti-Semites in Persia.

Americans have seen less than satisfactory results from its current leaders. What impels so many to give Trump a second look is his resolve to make sure that evil does not triumph.

Rabbi Grushcow: For me, the great lesson of the Purim story is not the slaughter of the non-Jews at the end, which I think simply points to the incompetence of the king and the over-the-top nature of the story. Rather, I am drawn to the scene in Chapter 4 where Esther decides to risk her position as queen, and even her life. She is willing to use every resource she has to change the course of history.

There's no denying that ego is often a driving force behind leadership, but it should not be the primary force. I want our leaders to be those who feel called to serve, who are willing to risk their own safety and comfort for the sake of the greater good. I also believe that fighting terror will require a lot more than one or two good leaders.

It is not just political candidates but each of us who should ask ourselves what Mordechai asked Esther: "Who knows, maybe you came to your position for a time like this?" ■

Hebron shooting raises serious questions

It has now been two weeks since the publication of a video showing an Israeli soldier mortally shooting a Palestinian stabber in Hebron. The footage has been seized upon by many who accuse the Israeli army of serial transgressions against Palestinians and Arab-Israelis.

Those allegations are patently unfair to Israeli soldiers, who are tasked with fighting terror in a moral manner and whose actions are constantly, and uniquely, placed under the microscope.

And yet, this terrible incident raises some important questions: should the soldier be charged with manslaughter, or does he deserve leniency because he is "one of our own," a defender of Israel? And does the fact that the video was filmed by a person affiliated with the controversial Israeli organization B'Tselem, which seeks to document allegations of human rights abuses in the West Bank and Gaza, make a difference?

In the weeks since this awful episode, Israelis and their leaders have debated these very questions. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, along with Moshe Ya'alon, the defence minister, have spoken in favour of trying the soldier, while Education Minister Naftali Bennet and Yisrael Beitenu Leader Avigdor Liberman have suggested the soldier be set free, even as the evidence strongly suggests he did not follow protocol for subduing a terrorist.

This incident also begs another question: can a Palestinian assailant be considered both a terrorist and a victim at the same time? After all, the story begins with the stabbing of an Israeli, an all-too-familiar act for which there can be no justification, and there are conflicting reports that the Israeli shooter may have been concerned that the stabber was wearing an explosive vest. Still, and as difficult as it may be, the two acts should be separated. Without a doubt, that is a difficult binary to comprehend, but it appears to be an accurate depiction of events.

As for B'Tselem, it may be fair to question why the video-taker happened to be in that precise spot at that exact moment. But then again, it is a rarity these days when a controversial incident is not caught on camera. And while the motivations and reporting of B'Tselem may be questionable, the veracity of this particular footage does not seem to be in doubt. There are two sides to every story, but in this case the courts will ultimately be left to decide whether or not the camera holds the truth.

Meanwhile, another scandal is brewing in Israel after separate reports emerged that two prominent politicians – Interior Minister Aryeh Deri and Zionist Union leader Isaac Herzog – are being investigated for financial improprieties. (Deri went to prison for 22 months in 2000 after being convicted of taking bribes during an earlier stint as interior minister.)

Both men have denied the allegations, but these revelations follow a disturbing trend of Israeli politicians behaving badly.

As former prime minister Ehud Olmert, convicted of bribery and breach of trust, and ex-president Moshe Katsav, found guilty of rape and obstruction of justice, serve jail time for their crimes, it is hard not to be skeptical of the political establishment. Israeli politicians should be fighting efforts to destabilize Israel, not contributing to them. ■ — YONI

OPEN LETTER

We need to support York University's Jewish community

York University gets a lot of attention in the Jewish press. We, professors of Jewish Studies at York, take this as a reflection of the community's care and concern for our students and their education, the university, Jewish life, and Jewish studies. Recent developments have led some to call on the community to cut itself off from York. We have reached the opposite conclusion: our campus matters. It's time to thoughtfully support the York Jewish community.

As professors, we strive to cultivate an educational space where our students are enriched by deep and informed encounters, so that they will learn from and think critically about the social and political worlds of the past and present. We introduce our extraordinarily diverse student body – a microcosm of Canada itself – to a wide range of Jewish subjects, values, and ideas, including history, literature, philosophy, religion, education, culture, and sociology, as well as the Bible, Zionism, the Holocaust, Yiddish, Hebrew, Canadian Jewry, and Israel.

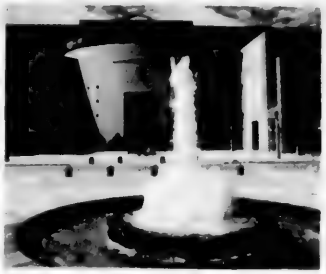
For many of our students, these courses provide their only exposure to Jews and Judaism beyond pop culture. As publicly engaged scholars, we serve as a community resource, teaching, programming, writing, and lecturing all over the world. And as humanists, historians, social scientists, and educators, we know that racisms – including anti-Semitism – result from not recognizing, knowing or genuinely encountering the humanity of the "other."

The solution to anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on campus surely is not to abandon campus. Rather, it is to double down on deep engagement with history and ideas, and to promote rich, real exchanges about ideas that matter.

York is a world-class research institution with a historic, material, and continuing commitment to Jewish studies, education, and life. We continue to work with the administration to improve the atmosphere on campus and bolster Jewish studies. That said, one issue of concern on campus is the York University Faculty Association's (YUFA) recent endorsement of a student-initiated #YUDivest campaign calling on York's board of governors to "permanently divest from weapons manufacturers."

We believe that the most important development amidst all of this is that YUFA actively and publicly distanced itself from the anti-Israel BDS sentiments (boycott, divestment, sanctions) associated with the original motion. The preamble to YUFA's motion states "The #YUDivest campaign does not advocate boycotts, divestment or sanctions against any state. Moreover, it proposes the elimination of all investments in munitions manufacturers [...] not those associated with any single country." And: "We are also endorsing only the stated principles and causes of this campaign, not those that may be held or pursued by one or more of the many organizations that have also endorsed it or are associated with it."

Yes, the pretext and subtext of this motion were clearly – albeit covertly – anchored in BDS activism. Yes, a distressing ambiguity lingers – to what extent does the motion mean something other than what it says? Nevertheless, over the past few weeks, York's senior administration and YUFA's president and executive have all resisted anti-Israel agitation, acting on their good consciences, and thanks to the engagement of Jewish and non-Jewish students, faculty, and community partners. We continue to work to ensure that YUFA will never endorse BDS. Despite the obvious and reasonable anxiety that has accompanied this debate, we believe that this preamble is a win for those who care about Jewish life at York. Successes will continue to come from engagement in our community – not retreat from it.



York University's Vari Hall

There has also been much discussion of late about the presence of a painting in the Student Centre. To some, the painting symbolizes anti-Zionist activism and anti-Semitic sentiment deep within York's culture. To others, it stands as a test case of free speech, academic freedom, and student governmental autonomy. Media attention has only increased this painting's symbolic potency. We support York President Mamdouh Shoukri's vision of a campus that is inclusive and safe. We also aim to foster rigorous debate and freedom of expression. At the same time, the painting in question has marginalized many Jewish students. We imagine that the student body responsible for the Student Centre would already have removed a painting that distressed any other minority group.

The painting affair and the armament divestment motion alike reveal both how high and how low the stakes are on matters of campus politics. The stakes are low because the vast majority of the York community is not especially invested in debating the politics of the Middle East. Much of our student body and faculty tune out the political noise surrounding them. Beyond our own local communities, motions and paintings like these have negligible impact. Yet the stakes are high because the contours of this debate shape our campus community and culture and have sown unwelcome divisiveness. The stakes are also high because the opinions students form and the knowledge they gain shape their future political lives. We take these high stakes very seriously. They speak precisely to why Jews and Jewish studies on campus are so important.

The solution is not to give up, divest from, abandon, or add fuel to the fire at York. It is to invest in Jewish students, Jewish life, and Jewish Studies. We invite everyone to our campus events, lectures, and to audit our classes. Come and engage the richness of Jewish life and learning at York University.

Finding a speaker can be a delicate task

Across Canada, Jewish organizations have been forced to backtrack and disinvite artists amid charges that they are too divisive

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

The directors of Toronto's Koffler Centre of the Arts were astonished when their guest speaker for a May event, U.S. playwright Tony Kushner, was harshly criticized for his statements about Israel. Last month, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto went so far as to disassociate itself from the event.

"We weren't and we aren't looking for any political discussion in regards to the issues that the UJA's concerned with," said Cathy Jonasson, executive director of the Koffler Centre.

"The dialogue we're interested in is primarily in the area of culture. When we stray into politics, we aren't legitimate as a cultural organization."

The controversy in Toronto is not unique. Across the country, Jewish organizations have been forced to backtrack, disinvite and sometimes defend artists and speakers when charges are made that they are too divisive or their remarks put them beyond communal norms.

Jewish organizations face the delicate task of finding prominent speakers who will not offend sponsors but are interesting enough to attract patrons.

In Kushner's case, separating his work, which includes a two-part epic on the AIDS epidemic, Angels in America, for which he won a Pulitzer Prize and a Tony Award, from his politics, is not easy.

The issue that concerned UJA was the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement (BDS) and which side of that divide Kushner sits on.

"He's straightforward on the issue. He doesn't support BDS. He does support Israel and you obviously take his word," Jonasson said in an interview. "We would have thought that issue was over and done with."

Evidently, it wasn't. The Toronto federation, which was listed as one of the Koffler Centre's institutional supporters, felt compelled to remove its name from advertising for the event.

"The speaker is associated with an organization that clearly supports BDS," said Steven Shulman, federation's campaign director and legal counsel. "There's lots of room for diversity, but there are certain lines. BDS is one of those lines we wouldn't want to affiliate ourselves with."

Tony Kushner

Achinoam Nini

Kushner is a member of the advisory board of Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP), which has endorsed BDS. He has, however, stated that he does not support a boycott of Israel.

In a letter published in the New York Jewish Week newspaper in 2011, when a debate arose as to whether City University of New York would grant him an honorary degree, Kushner wrote: "I am on the advisory board of Jewish Voice for Peace and have remained there even though I disagree with the organization about a number of issues, including the boycott. I remain affiliated because the men and women of JVP are courageous, committed people who work very hard serving the interests of peace and justice and the Jewish people and I'm honoured by my association with them."

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver also generated headlines in February when it invited renowned Israeli singer Achinoam Nini (known as Noa) to perform at community Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Critics pointed to Noa's vocal support of B'Tselem, an organization that monitors human rights in the West Bank, and Breaking the Silence, a left-wing NGO that criticizes the Israel Defence Forces.

JNF Canada, which had been a sponsor, backed out after hearing from its constituency, "many of whom had expressed discomfort with the artist's views and organizational affiliations," according to a statement issued at the time.

"Any artist who chooses to publicly intertwine their art with their politics is potentially opening themselves up to controversy," Josh Cooper, JNF's CEO, said in a statement to The CJN.

The Israeli Embassy and the Consulate General of Israel for Ontario and Western Canada in Toronto have since stepped in as sponsors.

The debate over whether Noa was an appropriate choice for Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities highlights the diversity among Canadian Jews when it comes to defining what support for Israel looks like.

"We do not all share the same political perspectives, and probably never will. But we do share the democratic values that allow ourselves and our neighbours to express them," said Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver CEO Ezra Shanken, in a statement to The CJN.

Noa has denied being a supporter of BDS, which is an important distinction, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs pointed out.

"Despite her passionate views and critical orientation to the current Israeli government, Achinoam Nini is clearly and demonstrably within the tent of the Zionist family. And, despite his passionate views, Tony Kushner has allowed his name and standing to be leveraged for purposes that are fundamentally inconsistent with the principles of the normative, pro-Israel community," Fogel said in a statement to The CJN.

I'm sorry for my silence

Avrum Rosensweig

When I was 16 years old and had just received my learner's permit to drive, I was asked by a graduate student at my yeshiva if I'd like to drive his automobile. Like all teens with this newfound power, I jumped at the opportunity. The student sat in the passenger seat.

At some point during the drive, the owner of the car put his hand on my lap, saying he wanted to be close to the steering wheel in case I lost control. I accepted his explanation. A few minutes later his hand moved up to my groin. I stopped the car abruptly, turned to him and yelled: "If you don't move your *&%^4 hand now, I'm going to beat the #+=% out of you." He did.

I never reported this incident to the yeshiva authorities. I didn't because I thought I had dealt with it properly and that was the end of it. I didn't consider I had been sexually accosted at all. It seemed to me that what the yeshiva student had done to me was a momentary act of physical trespassing, almost insignificant, and to make a big fuss over it would simply be dramatizing the issue.

The problem with my silence, however, was that this person went on to sexually abuse a number of other Jewish students, and years later was arrested, charged with sexual assault, found guilty and sentenced to home arrest. Is it possible I could have partially prevented harm to others?

Recently, two Jewish educators who taught and supervised in the Canadian Jewish school system were arrested on similar charges. While they had both been fired from their respective schools, it seems that those who were aware of the men's behaviour remained quiet.

I understand why silence is often the choice of those in the know for two reasons: coming forward might ostracize the person involved from the community, and, in addition, there is a Jewish imperative of not turning a fellow Jew into the authorities. However, silence in this case allowed these two teachers to move on to other schools and continue acting out their illness.

> We have begun to speak out about the effects of sexual molestation on children and teens

The positive news is the Jewish world is going through somewhat of a reformation in this area. We are beginning to recognize and accept that there are Jewish teachers, rabbis, rebbes, tutors, etc., who do molest their students, our children. Organizations and committees are cropping up in the Jewish world whose mandate it is to offer families and children a safe place where they can express the details of sexual abuse perpetrated against them and receive help. The culture of shuttling off teachers who sexually abuse students to another school and/or Israel is slowly starting to change. We have begun to speak out about the effects of sexual molestation on children and teens, such as living a life of depression or, in some cases, suicide.

As we go through these changes, we must take every step possible to help innocent young people in the Jewish community who have been harmed by individuals, schools and organizations meant to protect them, for example, by budgeting for their healing. Similarly, we must offer help to the perpetrators of sexual assault so they can learn how to stop their sexual deviance.

And of equal importance, our leadership must aggressively and authentically offer apologies over and over to those who have suffered terribly because of our silence. Our rabbis, principals, teachers and anyone who knew better, must ask forgiveness of those children they did not protect and often sentenced to a life of sadness and mistrust of the Jewish world and those in charge.

I'm sorry for my silence. ■

What if Goliath attacks?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

In the years 1945 to 1947, Marie Syrkin travelled to the displaced persons camps in Europe to meet with Holocaust survivors, and then to Israel to meet with the leadership of the Yishuv. There was enormous fear in the Yishuv – they knew a state was forthcoming in the near future, but worried that the neighbouring Arab countries would succeed in battle and push the Jewish inhabitants into the sea.

In those anxious days of 1947, Syrkin penned a poem titled David, which reads in part: "Suppose, this time, Goliath should not fail; suppose, this time, the sling should not avail… suppose the tale should have a different end…"

This haunting poem asks a frightening question: what if Goliath won?

While we can speculate about tragic counterfactuals, thankfully, Goliath did not win. However, the question is as relevant as ever. Israel, despite its military edge, still faces existential threats from multiple aggressors including Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah. We still must ask ourselves: "What if Goliath attacked and we did not help David?"

Jews have a mixed record on this question. In the 1940s, North American Jews in the United States did not do nearly enough during the Shoah. Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, in his book Were We Our Brothers' Keepers? reviews the halfhearted actions of the American Jewish community. At the end, he concludes: "The Final Solution may have been unstoppable by American Jewry, but it should have been unbearable for them. And it wasn't."

During the Holocaust, we were not our brothers' keepers.

Yet 20 years later, our community got it right. The activists of the Soviet Jewry movement insisted on being their brothers' keepers. They remembered the community's failure during the Shoah, and refused to repeat it. Yaakov Birnbaum, the founding father of the Soviet Jewry movement, spoke at the initial meeting of the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry on April 27, 1964. In a speech that launched a historic campaign to release millions of Soviet Jews, Birnbaum declared, "We, who condemn silence and inaction during the Nazi Holocaust, dare we keep silent now?"

Because of Birnbaum's exhortations, American Jews were not silent. Twenty-five years later, American Jews would finally learn to be their brothers' keepers.

"Am I my brother's keeper?" has often guided the policies of the State of Israel. Rabbi Sharon Shalom (an Ethiopian rabbi) related a wonderful anecdote when he spoke at our synagogue in Montreal last year.

In the early 1980s, he was rescued by the Mossad from a refugee camp in the Sudan. He was a child of eight, and Israel was smuggling Beta Israel children to Israel by spiriting them in the middle of the night to a beach, where they were carried onto a waiting boat that took them to Sinai.

Rabbi Shalom remembers being picked up and hugged by a big Israeli commando, who carried him to the boat. As he carried the child, the commando had tears streaming down his eyes. The rabbi remembers that, as a young boy, he couldn't understand why the big, strong soldier would be crying; after all, what did he have to be afraid of? Now, of course, Rabbi Shalom understands. The soldier was crying because he was picking up his younger brother and saving him from danger.

We, too, must help our brothers in Israel. Last week, I attended the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) policy convention with 18,000 other supporters of Israel. (It's disappointing a similar gathering does not take place in Ottawa.) For three days, a convention like no other unfolded. Yes, there were speeches from presidential candidates, an important part of AIPAC's mission to lobby on behalf of Israel. But there were also informative and inspiring presentations.

Above all, there was the shared determination of 18,000 supporters of Israel. Their very presence declared: we are our brothers' keepers.

And if Goliath attacks again, we will be there for Israel. ■

A timid hero

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo has much in common with the late Rabbi David Hartman. Rabbi Cardozo was, as Rabbi Hartman was, ordained in an Orthodox yeshiva. Both immigrated to Israel in the belief that only there can Orthodoxy, indeed Judaism, renew itself and remain relevant. Both created institutions in Jerusalem to promote their ideas: the Shalom Hartman Institute and the David Cardozo Academy.

But despite their Orthodox training and way of life, the Israeli religious establishment has shunned them because they've challenged the rigidity of the Israeli rabbinate.

But Rabbi Cardozo seems to be less of a pluralist. Whereas the Hartman Institute welcomes students, fellows and teachers from across the Jewish spectrum, the lecturers listed in the Cardozo Academy are all Orthodox, albeit often somewhat on the fringe.

I heard Rabbi Cardozo declare recently that Conservative and Reform Judaism isn't for him. But the way he described his own religious outlook, he is decidedly not for Orthodox Judaism. Not surprisingly, therefore, as he told the audience, he's no longer invited to speak, even in the Orthodox synagogue where he's a regular worshipper.

He seems to bear the isolation and the implied humiliation with dignity. The film that was made about his life has the title of his brief autobiography, Lonely but not alone, which, incidentally, is also the title of the memoir of the late Queen Wilhelmina of his native Netherlands. His loneliness is obvious, but other than in the circle of his family and personal friends, he may also be quite alone, as he's apparently excluded from the company of his Orthodox colleagues.

This he shares with the late Rabbi Louis Jacobs, the most erudite and kindest Jewish scholar it was my privilege to know. He was de facto excommunicated from the Orthodox establishment in his native Britain. An Orthodox synagogue even refused to call him to the Torah in connection with a family celebration.

But unlike his Israeli maverick colleagues, Rabbi Jacobs made common cause, albeit somewhat reluctantly, with the Conservative (Masorti) movement. The New London Synagogue that was formed around him became the mother congregation of the other Masorti synagogues that have since been formed in the United Kingdom.

Rabbi Jacobs, like Rabbi Hartman, seems to have realized that you can't be a religious reformer without being open to all manifestations of Judaism. Thus, he taught for many years at the Leo Baeck College in London that trains non-Orthodox rabbis. He may have realized that it's not enough to argue from within that Jewish law has to change for Orthodox Judaism to become relevant. Practical – also political and organizational – steps must be taken outside the Orthodox framework.

Rabbi Cardozo seems to prefer to stay inside the Orthodox tent as a maverick rather than to accept, perhaps even celebrate, his outsider status. He appeals to his Orthodox colleagues to have courage to adapt Halachah to contemporary conditions, as he did, for example, in an article last year in the Jerusalem Post magazine, but like other internal critics of the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel and elsewhere, he fails to accept that the effort is quixotic.

It makes him something of a timid hero, a term used by my teacher, the late Rabbi Ignaz Maybaum, about Rabbi Jacobs, perhaps too harshly. The same can be said, apparently with greater certainty, about Rabbi Cardozo. For all the heroic and erudite efforts he's making to bring about reforms from within, it's only people outside who seem to heed his words. The Israeli Orthodox establishment wields too much political power to tolerate internal challenges.

Rabbi Cardozo may get mild applause from maladjusted Orthodox Jews for his views, as he did when I heard him speak in Jerusalem, but in the end, he'll only see results if he joins forces with other religious, not just Orthodox, women and men who care enough about Judaism not to allow it to be hijacked by extremists. ■

The Rushdie affair and the outsourcing of murder

Sheryl Saperia

The recent attacks in Brussels, for which ISIS took credit, reminded the West that no country is immune from Islamist terrorism. All democratic nations must match action to rhetoric in decisively defeating the sadistic group.

Yet Iran, which has the advantages of a nation-state alongside the revolutionary zeal of a terrorist organization, continues to pose a more serious threat to global security. Long before ISIS and Al Qaeda butchered their way onto the international scene and utilized social media to attract recruits, Iran had pioneered the outsourcing of terrorism to the global extremist community.

In 1988, Salman Rushdie published The Satanic Verses, a novel that garnered literary praise but that many Muslims perceived as blasphemous. As controversy spread with riots and book burnings, the book was banned in several countries. The Rushdie affair peaked in 1989, when Iran's Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, broadcast this edict on radio: "I am informing all brave Muslims of the world that the author of The Satanic Verses, a text written, edited and published against Islam, the Prophet of Islam and the Qur'an, along with all the editors and publishers aware of its contents, are condemned to death. I call on all valiant Muslims, wherever they may be in the world, to kill them without delay, so that no one will dare insult the sacred beliefs of Muslims henceforth."

Islamists lined up to volunteer. Rushdie went into hiding for several years, and has managed to stay alive. Others involved with the book were not as fortunate. In 1991, the Japanese translator was stabbed to death, and the Italian translator survived a stabbing. In 1993, the Norwegian publisher was shot three times, and the Turkish translator survived an arson attack in which 37 were killed.

Just last month, as further proof of the fatwa's ongoing authority, 40 state-run media outlets in Iran contributed an additional $600,000 to the bounty offered for Rushdie's assassination. The total amount now on offer is in the millions of dollars.

The edict's recent and gratuitous revival, despite Tehran's ostensible rehabilitation under the international nuclear agreement, is symptomatic of a well-established and deliberate Iranian policy to demonstrate dominance over an enemy it despises – the West. It is meant to communicate that no deal will mitigate the Islamic revolutionary ideals upon which the Iranian theocracy was founded.

The free speech organization PEN has rightly urged democratic governments to insist that Iran nullify the fatwa once and for all. A letter signed by over 100 writers and academics calls on the West to "unequivocally condemn the regime's fatwa and bounty, demand their immediate cancellation, prioritize human rights and free expression, and side with freethinkers rather than appeasing a theocratic regime."

As a champion of the United Nations and our national charter, both of which enshrine the right to freedom of expression, the Canadian government is well suited to lead on this issue.

Canada should immediately deny accreditation to any Iranian media outlets that contributed to the bounty, and even consider designating them as terrorist groups. Consider the relevant portions of the Criminal Code definition of terrorist activity: committing an act for a political, religious or ideological purpose, with the intention of intimidating the public or compelling a person, a government or an organization to do or to refrain from doing any act that intentionally endangers a person's life.

Canada recently joined the United States, European nations and Japan in speaking out against Chinese human rights abuses and regional aggression. If the West can publicly condemn such an economic powerhouse, surely it can apply pressure on Tehran, which needs western business.

The return of the Rushdie edict presents the West with an opportunity to stand up for its own democratic principles and against a regime that has met every open hand extended to it with a clenched fist. ■

Child sexual abuse in community rampant, audience told

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jews must put aside fear of shaming their community, their families and themselves, as well as perceived prohibitions of turning to secular authorities, to fight a growing wave of child sexual abuse, speakers told an audience at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Speakers addressing a packed sanctuary on March 31 made blunt, often harrowing assessments of childhood sexual abuse in Jewish communities, saying the problem is rampant and is too often ignored or denied outright.

There was a large Orthodox contingent in attendance, and speakers stressed that Orthodox and chassidic communities offer much resistance to dealing with the sexual abuse of children. It is time to end the silence, they said.

MC Benny Forer, a graduate of Ner Israel Yeshiva north of Toronto, and now a deputy district attorney in Los Angeles, recounted how his best friend had been sexually abused and killed himself on Yom Kippur in 1993.

There is an "astonishing" amount of sexual abuse in Jewish circles, Forer said. "We have to stand up and say this is unacceptable."

The session was organized by Jewish Community Watch (JCW), a five-year-old New York-based group that raises awareness of child sexual abuse, exposes abusers, and offers programs, referrals and services for victims and their families.

The organization gained recognition "throughout many Orthodox Jewish communities all over the world," it states on its website. "The team has championed, through the backlash and resistance of a grandfather culture concerned more for the image of the community than the lives of the victims, to ensure that every Jewish victim of [abuse] has a place to be heard and to be validated."

Orthodox Jews must not allow halachic terms to cover their unwillingness to face up to the issue, said Rabbi Yosef Blau, a mashgiach ruchani (spiritual adviser) at Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary.

The term mesira, one who hands over a Jew to outside authorities and "is understood to describe a terrible individual, is misused," Rabbi Blau said.

There are also "important exceptions" to lashon hara (hateful speech), he added.

Halachah indicates "very clearly" that when there is a danger to the community and internal mechanisms fail, Jews are "permitted, even "obligated" to go to secular authorities "to ensure that people are protected," Rabbi Blau said.

"We can't allow justifications and rationalizations to get in the way."

If a school where an abuser has taught, or a parent with knowledge of an abusive teacher does not pass along information about him, "each one of those bears responsibility for the abuse that's going to follow," Rabbi Blau said.

Det.-Const. Joel Manherz of the Toronto Police Service Sex Crimes Unit's Child Exploitation Section took the audience through the mechanics of laying a police complaint.

Meyer Seewald

Manherz is assigned to the case of Stephen Joseph Schacter, a former teacher at two Toronto-area Jewish day schools, who is facing several sex crime charges involving minors, based on witnesses having come forward.

"Finding the courage to come forward doesn't mean finding the fortitude to call police," Manherz said. "It means being resolute in your actions and words. It means being prepared for the possibility that people may know you have come forward with the intention of making your community a better and safer place to live."

When it comes to giving evidence, "you are in control."

He said that under Canadian law, there is no statute of limitations for prosecuting sex crimes involving children, and that teachers and clergy may be prosecuted themselves for failing to report such actions.

The evening also heard from the Orthodox father of a child who had been abused by his counsellor at a Jewish summer camp in New York state. The child came forward with the allegations three years after they happened, following bouts of depression and rebellious behaviour.

The effect on families of abused children can be devastating, the father said. "We need to be better educated," he said. "We cannot rely on anyone else."

In a stirring address, Meyer Seewald, who co-founded JCW with his brother Shneur in 2011, said the only way to combat child sexual abuse is first to admit it happens in the Jewish community.

Despite "much opposition" from rabbis, Seewald, himself a survivor of sexual abuse, said he can "almost guarantee" that every rabbi knows of at least one case of abuse. Sexual abuse "is our dark little secret. It's only a matter of time before it explodes in our face."

Statistics show that between one in three and one in five girls, and one in five and one in six boys are victimized by sexual abuse, Seewald noted, and the most common form is incest.

JCW now has 12 full-time employees and spends up to $40,000 a month defraying the cost of therapy for victims.

"We have a huge problem," he said. "A day does not go by that I am not personally contacted by a victim."

But, "we will find you and you will be exposed," he pledged to abusers, "and that goes for those covering up the abuse."

To applause and cheers, he said the previous administration at Toronto's Eitz Chaim Schools, where Schacter once taught, should be held accountable for his actions. ■

Irwin Cotler links pursuit of justice and Jewish values

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Ontario MPP Indira Naidoo-Harris, left, interviews Irwin Cotler. GMAX PHOTOGRAPHY

At a gala event at which he was honoured, Irwin Cotler emphasized the connection between his Jewish values and his lifelong commitment to the pursuit of justice.

Cotler, an international human rights lawyer as well as former Quebec MP, minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, stressed that his devotion to fighting for the release of political prisoners in a number of global conflict zones has been underpinned by Jewish teachings.

"The release of political prisoners in Jewish tradition is such an overriding commandment that you're allowed to breach the Sabbath if you bring about their liberation," he said, to great applause at the event hosted by The Pearson Centre for Progressive Policy.

Called "The Pursuing Justice Gala," the March 31 event at the Omni King Edward hotel marked the official launch of The Pearson Centre's new Pursuing Justice Project, which will focus on advancing justice, diversity and inclusion in Canada by convening forums with what the centre calls "key opinion leaders" and stakeholders, as well as conducting seminars and research.

The Pearson Centre is a centrist think-tank that addresses policy issues related to justice, democratic participation and health and social services. Its stated goal is to engage Canadians in dialogue about a progressive future for Canada.

Following a reception, introductory speeches were given by Liberal MPs Jim Carr and Catherine McKenna, former prime ministers John Turner and Paul Martin and Liberal MPP Madeleine Meilleur.

Indira Naidoo-Harris, Liberal MPP for Halton, Ont., served as the night's moderator, directing a conversation with Cotler, who was the evening's keynote speaker.

The various speakers lauded Cotler for fighting for human rights and freedom on a global scale; he is notable for having served as counsel to a number of high-profile political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela in South Africa, Jacobo Timerman in Latin America and, in the former Soviet Union, Natan Sharansky, a Jewish activist who later become an Israeli politician.

Cotler said both Mandela and Sharansky embodied "the hope and inspiration…of two of the great human rights struggles of the second half of the 20th century."

Both were heroic figures who stood for freedom, equality, democracy and peace and transformed, respectively, "the face of South Africa and the former Soviet Union," Cotler noted.

He added: "I shudder to think what might've happened if they had not been freed."

He described visiting South Africa in 1981 as a guest of the anti-apartheid movement; he was, at that time, working as a lawyer on behalf of Sharansky.

He said he gave a speech to a group of South African law students with the message, "If Sharansky [should be freed], why not Mandela?"

Immediately following the talk, Cotler was arrested, he said, and brought to speak to South Africa's then foreign minister Roelof Frederik Botha.

"Botha asked me how I could speak in the same breath about Sharansky, who was fighting against Communism and Mandela [who was a Communist]. I said, because they're both fighting for freedom and human rights," Cotler recalled.

He said he told Botha that apartheid was a racist philosophy and a "racist, illegal regime" and that he planned to "fight until it's dismantled."

Cotler was subsequently released, and said that several years ago he heard from Botha, who ended up becoming an opponent of apartheid and the first prime minister in the South African government to call for Mandela's release.

"The model here is that, at the end of the day, anyone can be taught to pursue justice," Cotler said.

Cotler went on to speak about the importance of Canada recognizing the rights of its Aboriginal people and fighting for Aboriginal justice at all costs.

Further, he said that the pursuit of justice and human rights must serve as the organizing principal of Canada's policymaking, and emphasized the dangers of "indifference and inaction in the face of mass atrocity."

He noted that this year marks the 22nd anniversary of the Rwandan genocide, and that what was particularly horrifying about the event was that it was preventable.

"Nobody could say we didn't know. We knew but we didn't act. Just like with Darfur."

These historical lessons, Cotler said, must be applied by Canada to the current global refugee crisis. ■

MP denies allegations he supports anti-Israel views

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

During the last federal election campaign, Media Action Group, an organization that fights anti-Semitism, sent out an email referencing an online story that suggested the Liberal party was being infiltrated by Islamists. Omar Alghabra's name came up in the report, and not in a good way.

Alghabra went on to be elected MP for Mississauga Centre and later was named secretary of state for consular affairs, prompting more concern from some.

Last weekend, Alghabra was a guest of Solel Congregation in Mississauga, located just outside his riding, and JSpace Canada, a progressive Zionist organization.

In introducing Alghabra, JSpace spokesperson and co-ordinating committee member Karen Mock said critics had taken "potshots" at Alghabra and that the commentary over his appointment was "almost hysterical."

"That's not the Omar Alghabra that I know," she said.

Addressing the congregation, where he has visited various times to support interfaith projects in the area, Alghabra presented a picture of himself as an immigrant success story. A native of Syria who grew up in Saudi Arabia, he travelled to Canada on his own at age 19 to study engineering. During his early days in the country, he worked at a doughnut shop, meeting people from varied backgrounds. It was, he said, "the best political education."

In Syria and Saudi Arabia, he continued, he had been part of the majority Sunni Muslim culture. People celebrated the same holidays and life was simple. The world appeared as black and white, right and wrong. There were also widespread "stereotypes of minorities."

Today, he said, he looks back and realizes "how ignorant I was growing up" as well as sheltered and unfamiliar with the diversity of people. For that change in perspective, he thanked Canada.

Because of his background, he feels a responsibility to help "Jews and Arabs work together to advance the well-being of both and send a message to the Israelis and the Palestinians how we can work together to advance a common agenda."

In a question and answer period, Mock got the ball rolling by asking Alghabra his views on establishing peace between Israelis and Palestinians. Alghabra responded by stating unequivocally that "the targeting of civilians is unacceptable and should not be tolerated."

Omar Alghabra

Terrorism should not be romanticized or justified, "whatever the grievances people have... There are legitimate grievances and disputes over there that have to be dealt with," he said, adding Canada could play a role in bringing the two sides together.

Later, Alghabra expressed support for a two-state solution and said when people don't see steps taken toward peace, their "lack of hope and [lack of] progress on the ground make it easy for [them] to be seduced by the voice of radicalism."

In a brief interview with The CJN following his address, Alghabra was asked to comment on some of the allegations contained in the pre-election emailing. Asked if he supported sharia (Islamic law) in Ontario, as was suggested at the time, Alghabra said he had supported same sex marriage and women's right to choose, suggesting those positions were hardly compatible with an Islamic agenda

Asked if he thought Hamas and Hezbollah were terrorist organizations, he referred to a recent parliamentary debate on the BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) movement.

During the Feb. 18 debate, Alghabra was asked that question, to which he replied: "Our government put Hamas on a terrorist list. We believe Hamas is a terrorist organization until it gives up terrorist activities and joins us in our call for peaceful dialogue and consultations to reach a peaceful resolution to the two-state outcome that we would like to achieve."

In the same debate, Alghabra offered his views on BDS, saying not all advocates of BDS are motivated by anti-Semitism, though some are. He said some students see it as a non-violent way to express their views and that he did not believe in infringing on their right to express themselves.

He added, "It is important to respect the right of Israel to exist and the right of Palestinians to have their own independent nation. We can help achieve this by encouraging engagement, dialogue, and respect for all." ■

Wonderland turns down bid for kosher food cart

plungen@thecjn.ca

For the second year in a row, Canada's Wonderland has turned down a bid for a kosher food cart in the amusement park located north of Toronto.

Isaac Kraus, who had been negotiating for a kosher hot dog cart that would also provide cold cut sandwiches, hamburgers, falafels, salads and other foods, received an email on March 16 from Wonderland vice-president and general manager Norm Pirtovshek, turning him down.

"At this time, we have no requirement for another supplier of kosher product," Pirtovshek stated. "Based on consumer demand, the product offering we have at this time fills the need of our guests."

Kraus said Pirtovshek was referring to Wonderland carrying pre-packaged dairy sandwiches provided by Tov-Li, to be made available at various restaurants in the park. However, his proposal was to sell meat meals at a dedicated cart.

Kraus said he is disappointed at Wonderland's decision, especially since he was led to believe early in the negotiation process that the theme park was receptive to his proposal.

Isaac Kraus and his kosher hot dog cart.

Kraus said he had met with Brian Kerr, the park's food manager, who was eager to hear his ideas. But that was last summer, not long after Wonderland turned down Howie T's bid to offer kosher meat meals. Howie Rosenberg, who runs Howie T's, had been providing kosher meals at Wonderland for two years before being told in 2015, shortly before the summer season began, that his services were no longer required.

Kraus attempted to step into the void, offering to open a cart in mid-August. He said he was told at the time it was too late for the 2015 season, but he should apply for 2016.

Negotiations continued in the fall and early winter. At first, talk was about Kraus obtaining a kiosk, but Wonderland wanted him to agree to install a new burner and pay 50 per cent of his gross take. Kraus agreed to both. However, as time went on, Wonderland indicated that a kiosk was not available and negotiations turned to a food cart instead. Still, Kraus said, he was willing to accommodate the park.

Over the winter, talks bogged down. Kraus found his calls to Wonderland went unanswered. Meetings were re-scheduled. Then on Feb. 16, he received an email from Brian Kerr, the park's director of food operations, stating: "Unfortunately we've been unable to take on any new concessionaires as our space hasn't become available as we first thought."

When Kraus complained to Pirtovshek, saying a food cart takes up very little space, Wonderland's general manager responded with the March 16 email saying there was insufficient demand.

Coincidentally, Rosenberg went through a similar negotiating experience the year before. Rosenberg operated Howie T's food cart at Wonderland for two years before he was told in the spring of 2015 that his services were no longer required.

At the time, a Wonderland spokesperson told The CJN the decision was made because of "lack of demand and minimal sales."

Kraus, who operated a successful kosher food cart in Wonderland until 1997, and later in Niagara Falls for several years, is puzzled. "When I first started with them, they had Tov-Li. Why negotiate with me for six months? They already had Tov-Li."

Kraus believes Wonderland does not appreciate the benefits of a dedicated kosher spot in the park. The cart will attract people who otherwise wouldn't visit Wonderland, he said.

Asked to comment about Kraus' concerns, Soulla Lindo, Wonderland's manager of public relations and communications, said Tov-Li is currently providing kosher meals at the Backlot Cafe and Action Zone.

There was no way to hook up a food cart to water and electricity services, she said, though Kraus maintains his cart is self-contained.

"We've done it in the past," Lindo said. "We've gone down this route and offered kosher food items and the sales weren't there."

Kraus believes the business is there. For kosher consumers, he said, "hot dogs are a treat in itself. For the Orthodox, it's a huge deal." ■

"Before meeting Michael I was paying too much in tax. Michael used his special knowledge and experience as an investment advisor with a tax legal background to arrange my portfolio so that I paid much less tax and kept more in my pocket. Thank you Michael for all of your help." – Gary Teicht

Most investors worry about the total return on their retirement portfolio. But the biggest cost of a portfolio is usually the tax bill. In fact, at the highest tax bracket, every tax dollar you save is equivalent to more than two dollars earned by you. Rabbi Weiss recalls days as advocate for Soviet Jewry

plungen@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Avi Weiss is no stranger to highly charged political causes. He was thrown out of the Auschwitz death camp in 1989 for protesting the presence there of a Carmelite convent; in 1985 he lambasted then-president Ronald Reagan for visiting a German military cemetery that held the graves of SS troops; he's advocated for the release of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard; and he's supported a U.S. Supreme Court decision allowing same sex couples to marry.

But of all the causes he has promoted, it is the one to support freedom for Soviet Jews that tugs closest to his heartstrings.

"It was a humble hero movement," Rabbi Weiss said.

Rabbi Weiss was a young man when he first took to the streets to push for freedom for Soviet Jews. It was 1964, at the height of the U.S. civil rights movement, when Rabbi Weiss first got involved as a leader with Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry.

Now 71, Rabbi Weiss is author of Open Up the Iron Door: Memoirs of a Soviet Jewry Activist, a book he wrote in 2015. He was scheduled to reminisce about his activist days at a public lecture at Beth Tikvah Congregation on April 3.

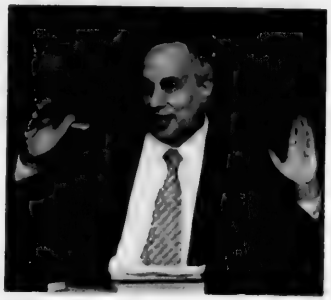
Beth Tikvah is intimately connected to the movement for Soviet Jews, Rabbi Weiss explained on the phone from New York before the event. Avital Sharansky, wife of then "Refusenik" Natan Sharansky, spoke there on several occasions. Her relative, Stan Solomon, is a member of the shul and was very active in the movement, Rabbi Weiss noted.

Back in the day, young activists butted heads with members of the Jewish establishment during discussions over the extent of the pressure the United States should exercise in promoting Soviet emigration .

"We were young, hard-hitting, raised in the shadow of the Shoah," Rabbi Weiss explained.

In the early 1970s, the Jackson-Vanik Amendment was a hot topic in the United States. It tied trade to Soviet emigration and it divided young activists from many establishment Jews, who feared the Nixon administration's efforts at detente would be hampered by confronting the Soviet Union.

Going back even before Jackson-Vanik was being debated, Rabbi Weiss said the movement for Soviet Jews resulted from "a confluence of several factors. I think Jews, 20 years after the Holocaust, began to stand up and the clarion call was, 'never again.'"



Rabbi Avi Weiss FILE PHOTO

At the same time, the civil rights movement was in full bloom and many young people were influenced by Rev. Martin Luther King, who himself spoke out in support of Soviet Jews.

You can add to the mix Israel's remarkable victory in the 1967 Six Day War, which "instilled pride in Jews, to stand up," he said.

It took many years before the doors of the Soviet Union were flung open and in 1985, recalled Rabbi Weiss, he and others, including Moshe Ronen – at the time a student activist who would go on to become president of Canadian Jewish Congress – were arrested in Geneva during the first Reagan/Mikhail Gorbachev summit over a sit-in at the Aeroflot Soviet national airline's offices.

He spent two days in a maximum security prison for the act – just one of 50 times he's been arrested for his activism, 36 of them connected to the Soviet Jewry movement.

With the perspective of years, Rabbi Weiss now says, "there are certain things I did that I regret."

Despite his disagreements with the establishment, he believes both were working towards the same goal.

There was "a cacophony, [we were] at each other's throats," he said. "In the end, we were a symphony. We needed the activists. We needed the establishment."

"It took the activists to push the establishment to be more aggressive on this," he said. "It's the way it works. Movements start on the fringe."

Looking back, Rabbi Weiss believes advocacy for Soviet Jewry was something momentous.

"It was the most important Jewish human rights movement since the Holocaust," he said. ■

GUEST VOICE

Have you had enough Jewish studies by Grade 8?

Rabbi Lee Buckman

As head of school at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, I frequently speak about the importance of a Jewish high school education and why I love what I do. It centres around three factors.

First, a Jewish high school education plays a vital role in solidifying a teenager's Jewish identity. Adolescence is such a turbulent period of life that teenagers often reject, challenge, question and doubt some of the most sacred family values and norms. This is even true for children who have had an elementary Jewish day school education – one week of adolescence can wipe out a lot of tuition dollars quite speedily.

What Jewish high schools do is maximize the investment that parents and teachers have made during the early years of life and help students emerge Jewishly whole and strong.

Second, the big, complex questions are discussed and debated in high school. In elementary school, children gain a foundation in Hebrew, Jewish history and Jewish texts. The deeper questions lie ahead. I often hear some parents say that their children don't want to continue their Jewish studies after their bar or bat mitzvah. Sometimes I hear middle school students say that they already know "enough" Hebrew and Judaics.

I'm not sure why so many parents accept that argument. If a Grade 8 child were to say, "I know enough math already," we would roll our eyes and say, "That's why I am the parent!" The same should be our response when 13- or 14-year-olds say to us that they know enough about their heritage or Israel and don't need to continue their Jewish educational journey. There are a lot of understandable reasons for why parents may not choose Jewish high school for their child. "Knowing enough," however, is not one of them.

Third, a Jewish high school education prepares students to feel comfortable in their own Jewish skin when they face the "real world" outside the Jewish bubble. Some parents will be surprised to hear this because they think that Jewish day school only solidifies the bubble. They believe that only public schools or non-Jewish private schools prepare their child for the "real world."

> A Jewish high school education plays a vital role in solidifying a teenager's Jewish identity

Skeptics will say: "How will my child ever be able to deal with the open, diverse world of the university if he or she is sheltered in a day school all his or her life?"

The most perceptive response I've heard to this question comes from a former high school student of mine. "When I get to the university, I will have developed such a strong sense of who I am as a Jew that I will be able to contribute to that diversity," he said. "And that's only because of my Jewish day school education." Out of the mouths of babes comes the most powerful advice to us adults.

So, has your child had enough Jewish studies by Grade 8? Hopefully you will agree, absolutely not. Every day that I walk through our school doors, I see firsthand the path to passionate and committed Jewish adulthood being shaped – each student strengthening a Jewish future for all of us. ■

Lawyer looking for local victims of international terror

plungen@thecjn.ca

Toronto lawyer Leo Adler wants to bring those who violate international humanitarian law by their terrorist campaigns against Israel to justice.

Adler, Canadian counsel for The Lawfare Project, believes these human rights violators – more specifically, those who ordered and carried out terrorist attacks – can be, and should be, prosecuted for their breaches of international law, right here in Canada.

To do so, however, would require several difficult and problematic hurdles be cleared, starting with the most basic: finding a Canadian who was a victim of Palestinian terrorism. That would start the ball rolling, leading ultimately, he hopes, to a criminal prosecution of a terrorist perpetrator.

Adler is appealing to victims to come forward. "We would hold their hands through the process," he said.

Fighting terrorism on a legal battleground is one of many tactics promoted south of the border by The Lawfare Project.

The New York-based NGO describes itself as "a legal think tank that facilitates litigation and other legal actions to protect the civil and human rights of the pro-human rights and counter-terrorism communities, halt the funding of terrorism, and combat the persistent abuses of U.S. and international legal systems by those who oppose democracy and freedom."

Among its anti-terrorism activities, it cites legal actions against organizations that provide material support for designated terror groups; exposing state-sponsored indoctrination of Palestinian children to become suicide bombers; and pursuing war crimes charges against terror leaders and state sponsors of terrorism.

Adler said the Palestinians have been pursuing Israel at the International Criminal Court (ICC) ever since the Palestinian Authority (PA) was named an observer state by the UN. Even before that, the Comoros Islands and Turkey sought to bring Israel to the ICC bar over the death of nine Turkish jihadis on board the Mavi Marmara, a Comoros Islands-registered ship that was attempting to run Israel's blockade of Gaza in 2010.

"We're outraged by how Israel is positioned as the criminal when all you have to do is listen to Palestinian radio and [visit] websites where they promote hate and terrorism and incite their young people," Adler, who in addition to practising law also teaches international criminal law at Osgoode Hall said.

"We're into a stabbing stage now. We feel the real criminals ought to come to trial. Those real criminals are the people at the head of Hamas, certain people at the head of the Palestinian Authority, and people at the head of Iran. These are the groups and countries that are committing war crimes and crimes against humanity," Adler said.

"We want to be able to get arrest warrants for those guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, or just plain murder, involving Canadians," he continued. "That means we're looking for Canadians who were victims, either of the Gaza wars or of other terrorist attacks that occurred."

Adler believes that once presented with a file prepared by the Lawfare Project, outlining the case in some detail, Canadian authorities will prosecute it.

"The Canadian government has always indicated to me when I've spoken to them that they take their obligations to prosecute anyone who commits these types of heinous crimes against Canadians very seriously." Adler said the prosecution of two Rwandans provides a precedent in prosecuting war crimes committed abroad.

But how does launching a case in Canada bring to justice someone living in Gaza or the Palestinian territories?

There are two mechanisms available, he responded. One is through extradition if and when the alleged perpetrator travels abroad to a country with which Canada maintains an extradition treaty.

In addition, the charges would be relayed to Interpol, which could "red flag" the alleged perpetrator and he would be held if he travels to any of the more than 100 countries in which Interpol operates.

For Adler, prosecuting terrorists who attack Jews is a matter of justice.

"Jews are no longer the lambs to be led to the slaughter," he said.

"For millenia Jews have been the target of violent injustice," he said. "If there's anything we should have learned from our history, including the Shoah, it's that we cannot allow the perpetrators to avoid justice." ■

Daughter spots her teenaged survivor mother in video

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like so many of us, Evelyn Rochwerg was noodling around the Internet one night, on a Facebook group for children of Holocaust survivors. Someone had posted a YouTube trailer for a film called Every Face Has a Name, an award-winning 2015 Swedish documentary that attempts to track down and interview survivors of German concentration camps, seen in black-and-white archival shots, arriving at the harbour of Malmo, Sweden, on April 28, 1945.

The film trains its lens on elderly survivors' reactions as they recognize themselves or relatives in the grainy, black-and-white footage of those arriving to safety in Sweden at war's end.

Rochwerg, who lives in Richmond Hill, was always interested in locating long-lost loved ones. She clicked on the two-minute trailer – "I figured, what are the chances?" – and within 10 seconds, she "totally freaked out."

There in the crowd, smiling broadly and waving between two grim-faced kerchiefed women on that spring day in 1945 was her 16-year-old mother, Lola.

"Oh my God, I was screaming. I said, 'My mother's in the video!' I didn't know this existed. I never saw a picture of my mother as a child. I was on such a high," Rochwerg, 58, told The CJN in an effusive interview.

After calming down, Rochwerg ordered the film and wrote to its producers, who have said they are eager to track down the stories of the people in the archival shots.

"I've gone through these pictures quite a lot of times and have more than one time wondered about the girl with the big smile," said researcher Sebastian Claesson, who had a few questions for Rochwerg.

The Krakow-born Lola Preiss was an inmate of the Ravensbruck concentration camp in northern Germany and lost her parents and both brothers in the Holocaust. After liberation, she was taken by the Red Cross to Denmark, where she was quarantined for several weeks, and then on to Sweden.

"You can see from the few seconds of footage that they're not happy," Rochwerg noted of the glum arrivals.

"They're now free but they've just been through hell."

Yet, her mother wears a high-wattage, ear-to-ear smile.

"She was still young and all alone, but I guess she realized that she had her whole life ahead of her."

Evelyn Rochwerg's mother Lola can be seen smiling in the second row.

Lola is now 87 and is wintering in Florida. Rochwerg said she can hardly wait to screen the footage for her. And in keeping with the movie's theme, she also wants to film her mother's reaction to seeing her younger self.

"She has the same face," Rochwerg said with a chuckle.

After arriving in Sweden, her mother was taken to an all-girls school in the town of Forsbacka. Soon after, Jakob Sylman, a fellow Pole who survived the war in Siberia, arrived to attend an all-boys school. The two met and planned to get to Palestine.

They set sail at the height of the British blockade. Though their ship landed, they and the other passengers were intercepted and taken to Cyprus, where they were interned.

Following statehood, they made it to Israel, where they helped start Kibbutz Dovrat. They were married in 1949 and came to Canada in 1952 to begin new lives.

Her parents "never talked about their experiences," Rochwerg said. "It wasn't something we discussed. My mother tried to shield me from anything bad." Her father died two years ago.

As an added bonus, also in the same shot as her mother is Rochwerg's father's first cousin, Hava Sylman, who was then around 25 and also survived Ravensbruck. She's now in her mid-90s and lives in Toronto.

Hailed by Variety magazine, Every Face Has a Name shows Jews arriving from all over Europe – "Norwegian prisoners of war, Polish mothers and children, members of the French resistance and British spies – and perhaps unique among them, a young Italian-American who was accused of being a spy while visiting her grandparents and deported to Auschwitz."

Rochwerg still can't get over the shock of seeing her mother's young, happy face.

"I keep looking at the video," she said. ■

Shelter rescues Israeli dogs and 'Jewish' horses

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Fifty or so kilometres north of Toronto, on a farm in King City, dogs with names like "Doobi" and "Chetz" sit and heel in response to Hebrew commands.

Dog Tales, a dog and horse sanctuary owned by Israeli couple Danielle Eden and Rob Scheinberg, is home to dozens of dogs rescued from kill shelters located in countries around the world – Israel being one – and around 70 horses rescued from meat buyers in Canada.

The 50-acre farm currently provides sanctuary to about 80 dogs that would otherwise be killed due to capacity issues in shelters in places such as Greece, Africa, Egypt, Romania and the United States, in addition to Israel.

It also takes on what Eden calls "surrenders" from Canada – dogs given up by their owners for various reasons.

"There's a high kill shelter we work with in Miami, for example, where they get so many dogs they have no room for them and have to euthanize some – it doesn't matter if the dog is old, sick or healthy… In Israel, there are too many shelters and too many dogs, and it's a very small country… A dog that has been sitting in a shelter for years there will be adopted here within only a few days," Eden explained.

Since opening in 2015, Dog Tales has rescued about 100 dogs from Israel and has found permanent homes in and around the Greater Toronto Area for more than 350 dogs in total.

The rescues, which live in an indoor kennel and are walked by staff on the outdoor grounds five or six times a day, are gradually trained to understand English commands.

Still, Eden typically uses the Hebrew words for "sit" and "come here" with newly arrived Israeli dogs, and she's taught these basic Hebrew terms to her staff.

In addition to the dogs, a number of the horses – many of which are retired or old and most of which are not available for adoption, but spend their days grazing in the property's expansive fields – have been given what Eden referred to as "Jewish names," such as Eli and Avram.

Dog Tales, which has the capacity for about 100 dogs at a time, often takes in dogs that are older, deaf, blind, injured or have been stuck in cages for years in their country of origin.

Dog Tales' owner Danielle Eden with Cava, adopted several months ago from Israel

The sanctuary doesn't rescue puppies, because, as Eden said, "everyone else does," adding, "I'm trying to take the dogs that aren't the absolute hardest cases but are stuck [in shelters] for no good reason. For example, around the world, people often don't like to adopt black dogs, because they see them as bad luck, or they don't want older dogs."

Dog Tales employs a handful of dog handlers, a night guard and three veterinary technicians, who are available to do blood work or perform surgery as needed.

Every Sunday, the sanctuary has an open house and people from across the GTA come to scope out dogs for potential adoption, often while recorded Hebrew music is played in the background.

Also on Sundays, an Israeli chef is often brought in to cook vegetarian Israeli dishes such as shakshuka, bourekas and hummus, which visitors can eat for the price of donations that go toward the animals' care.

Eden, who lives on the farm with her husband, grew up in the heart of downtown Tel Aviv, but has always been passionate about animals and animal welfare.

A longtime dog owner, she and her husband used to donate money to dog shelters in Israel before they decided to open their own sanctuary outside of Toronto, where Eden first lived for a period after moving from Israel. Scheinberg is Israeli but was raised in Canada.

Before opening Dog Tales, Eden studied acting in Israel and recently starred in an Israeli movie, called Laugh Lines, which ran in the Montreal Film Festival in 2015.

"I'm not acting anymore. This is a full-time job. I can't do both," she said. ■

Purim peaceful this year in Montreal borough

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Purim passed without incident in Outremont this year and no tickets were issued for the use of minibuses to ferry chassidic children around the neighbourhood, as is the custom of this community on the holiday.

However, the issue is by no means settled, as far as the Chassidim are concerned, say Mayer Feig, a spokesperson for the Jewish Orthodox Community Council, and Mindy Pollak, an Outremont borough councillor, who is chassidic.

In 2014 and last year, six tickets were issued by police to the drivers of minibuses rented by the chassidic community to transport children from home to home on Purim. The children bring gifts to members of their community and generally spread good cheer.

The tickets, which average $245 each, were contested in Montreal municipal court and, on Feb. 22, the prosecutor withdrew the charges. The judge approved that decision saying that there is insufficient signage on the streets of Outremont informing the public of the ban on this type of vehicle.

The case of two other tickets being contested is due to come before the court in April. The defendants are being represented by lawyers associated with the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations (CRARR), a non-profit organization that fights discrimination.

The lawyers argue that the bylaw invoked to prohibit minibuses on residential streets has a discriminatory effect on Chassidim and therefore contravenes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as Quebec's rights charter.

Feig thanked the police for showing "sensitivity and leadership" in refraining from stopping the circulation of the minibuses this year. He said he had been told the police conducted their own internal legal review and used their discretion in not applying the bylaw.

Bylaw 1171 was adopted by Outremont in 2003 to prevent large inter-city buses from circulating on residential streets. This was in response to complaints about the frequent buses the Chassidim run between Montreal and New York.

Feig said the community, by and large, accepted that this was a reasonable restriction. Things were quiet until 2013 when, for the first time, tickets were issued against minibuses under that bylaw.

Feig charged that this was at the instigation of "a certain individual who found a technicality in the wording of the bylaw" that could make it applicable to minibuses even though typically, with 21 seats, they are much smaller than the New York-bound coaches.

He was referring to borough councillor Céline Forget, a longtime campaigner against what she views as violations by Chassidim of Outremont regulations.

The bylaw refers to vehicles with more than two back wheels, which could be interpreted to encompass minibuses. The borough has suggested the community use smaller minivans, but Feig said these are not as safe. "This is all about the safety of the kids," he said.

The issue is also larger. It's about the Chassidim's sense that the borough is targeting the community and trying to make it feel unwelcome, he said.

The community, made up of different sects, continues to grow and is estimated to represent at least 20 per cent of the population.

"We have reached out to the mayor [Marie Cinq-Mars] and asked her to sit down with us and work out a solution… But the mayor has refused to listen," Feig said.

While everything went smoothly this year, Feig said the past couple of years have been "very stressful" for the community on what is supposed to be one of its most joyous holidays.

"The past two years were almost a battle of the streets, with police cars all around us… It does not make sense to harass a community," he said. "We just want to live in peace… vivre ensemble," he said, borrowing Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre's slogan. ■

'We're not interested in being the police for speakers'

Jewish organizations such as Toronto's federation and JNF Canada, which sign on as sponsors but have not hired the speaker themselves, sometimes find themselves in the uncomfortable position of being seen as censors, a role they adamantly deny they play when they withdraw their sponsorships.

UJA Federation of Toronto cannot and does not want to be a clearing house for the hundreds of speakers its affiliated agencies bring in every year, which would be "a bureaucratic nightmare," Shulman said. "We're not interested in being the police for political speakers and cultural speakers," he said.

Drafting guidelines for speakers that would cover every situation without being too over-reaching would be impossible. In the end, federation relies on its co-operative relationships with the agencies it supports, he said.

The question of whether an artist's work can be separated from his or her politics is a thorny one, where lines are blurred. But even when Jewish organizations invite politicians who have an unambiguous record on Israeli issues, the situation can be less than straightforward.

JNF Canada rescinded its invitation to former Arkansas governor and Republican U.S. presidential hopeful Mike Huckabee last year, when statements he had made about same-sex couples and transgenderism came to light.

Huckabee, who was to have spoken at a Negev dinner in Ottawa raising money for autism research in Israel, was selected because he is a "staunch supporter of Israel," but the "media spotlight has recently focused on Mr. Huckabee's comments that bear no relevance to JNF or autism," Cooper said at the time.

A 2013 Negev dinner honouring then-prime minister Stephen Harper for his unequivocal support of the Jewish State attracted 4,000 people and raised what was then a record $5.7 million.

"I am not aware of any criticism," Cooper said in an emailed statement. "There was widespread recognition from our community that he was a most deserving honoree."

But, there were prominent members of the Jewish community who felt that Harper's record on refugees – his government had restricted access to health care for them, among other concerns – made him an inappropriate choice for a community that should have a particular sensitivity to refugee issues.

Mike Huckabee

Similarly, there were those who felt that Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne, honoured by CIJA and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto last year, was a poor choice because her government had taken a hard stance on extending funding to Jewish day schools.

Wynne, like Harper, is a supporter of Israel, and both politicians used the honour to announce an official mission to Israel.

Fogel says that "some criticism was motivated by partisan consideration, but none that I am aware of related to any substantive criticism of Premier Wynne's position on Israel."

The Jewish community and Israel's supporters are far from monolithic, and as political discourse has become more highly charged and partisan, perhaps it is impossible for Jewish organizations to find a compelling speaker who avoids any whiff of controversy.

But in some cases, there are guidelines. For CIJA, that means speakers may be chosen to educate or "provide a platform for competing views," Fogel said. "All of that is kosher, provided the overall program reflects balance and none of the participants breach the red line on either side of the spectrum (rejection of Israel, racism, etc.)"

For other groups in the Jewish community the interpretation of where that line lies varies. At the Koffler Centre, they are excited that Kushner will be sharing his experiences on the stage in May, Jonasson said.

"We have a responsibility to artists and to our audiences. We choose artists because we think they have something valuable to offer through their art." ■

Airport operator enthusiastic about vintage planes

JACK BORENSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The operator/partner of the little-known Markham Airport north-east of Toronto, developed his lifelong passion for airplanes and photography as a child.

Under Allan Rubin's watch over three decades, the small, private sector airport on 300 acres of land has accumulated a collection of vintage aircraft and memorabilia, as well as military photographic equipment. It also has a flight school and runs a high school co-op program. Rubin's goal now is to expand the airport.

The Thornhill, Ont., resident, now in his mid-70s, grew up in Toronto and spent much of his youth around privately owned Barker Airfield, which was located at the current intersection of Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue West.

"A school friend's father... took me flying in a World War II Tiger Moth plane he owned, which began my affection for aviation," Rubin said.

He received his first camera just before his bar mitzvah, and was a member of the Vaughan Road Collegiate camera club. "I had a chance to go to New York or Los Angeles to learn about photography, but my mother insisted I stay in Toronto and attend school."

Allan Rubin in front of a vintage RCAF jet

At 18, Rubin enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF). "At CFB Borden, they had a special photography school, and I began photo reconnaissance training."

At a Western Canada base, Rubin trained in operations as part of the photo intelligence corps. During the Cold War, he accompanied pilots and took aerial photographs on top secret NATO missions in various parts of the world.

"In 1957, I flew in an aircraft based out of England that reached an altitude of approximately 60,000 to 65,000 feet, entering Soviet Union airspace."

He became a member of Roadrunners Internationale, an elite group of pilots and technicians stationed at a base in the Nevada desert in the 1950s and '60s, during the Cold War. "The CIA was developing an aircraft that had a great speed of 24,000 miles per hour and could climb to 90,000 feet," he said. "The U.S. was so advanced in aeronautics during the late 1950s, that people thought aliens were operating those aircrafts."

In 1962, Rubin left the RCAF and returned to Canada. His wife, Lorraine, was pregnant, and they wanted to settle down. He quickly got a job as director of the photo engineering department at the Ontario Research Foundation (ORF).

"My job involved seeing what was occurring with high-speed motion picture and time lapse photography," he said.

Today, his focus is on his attempt to expand the Markham Airport so that it "functions as a regional airport providing aeronautic services to replace Buttonville Airport," which is slated to close in the fall of 2016.

The expansion would not affect the proposed Pickering Airport, he said. "This would result in no conflicts between air traffic at Pickering Airport and Markham Airport. Markham... would come within the control zone of Pickering's air traffic control."

Rubin is president of Jewish Veterans Association and of the Canadian Air Land Sea Museum and founder of the Jewish Canadian Military Museum.

"I have the largest military photographic equipment collection that I know of," he said. "Someday when we have a major museum, I hope to contribute wartime intelligence, photography and equipment."

He has also devoted 65 airport acres to agriculture "where we've produced soybeans growing 16 to 24 inches high, have two beehives and a cornfield."

Rubin is proud of his co-op education program on aircraft maintenance and mechanics at York Region secondary schools. "I'm hoping more Jewish kids become interested in aeronautics and aviation. Universities have opportunities to have their aerospace programs at our aviation facility instead of a classroom setting."

He is a 25-year-plus member of General Wingate Branch No. 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion, and president of the Jewish Canadian War Veterans Memorial Park Cemetery at Toronto's Mount Sinai Memorial Park. ■

Lilith editor returns home for Women's Symposium

MYRON LOVE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, WINNIPEG

Weidman Schneider has returned to Winnipeg many times over the years to see family. She will be back again on the weekend of April 9 and 10 as the keynote speaker at Winnipeg's first Jewish Women's Symposium, which will be held at the Rady Centre inside the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The Jewish Women's Symposium will begin on the Saturday evening with Havdalah and a program showcasing women's contributions to the performing arts. This will be followed by a wine and dessert reception. Sunday will be a series of sessions through a Jewish lens with 15 different panelists discussing such topics as Women in Jewish Leadership/Cultivating the Next Generation, Choices We Made, Jumping In, Navigating Challenges and Social Action/Jewish Values.

"We are thrilled to have Susan Weidman Schneider as our keystone speaker," says Tamar Barr, the assistant executive director at the Rady Centre which is co-sponsoring the symposium with National Council of Jewish Women of Canada – Winnipeg Section. "Susan's magazine, and her books, articles and lectures, are often credited with changing the way women see themselves and shape their roles in the Jewish community. Lilith provides women with fuel to power change."

Barr notes that Schneider's major articles have covered, among other subjects, Jewish women's philanthropy, the Jewish stake in abortion rights, gender stereotypes of Jews and the positive effects of feminism on Jewish life. She is the author of three books: Jewish and Female, the first book to take a comprehensive look at Jewish women's special concerns; Intermarriage: The Challenge of Living with Differences between Christians and Jews and Head and Heart, about money in the lives of women – and has won several journalism awards.

Weidman Schneider credits her early synagogue involvement in Winnipeg for helping develop her feminist outlook. "My maternal zaide was a member of the Rosh Pina Synagogue in North Winnipeg," she recalls. "And in the Junior Congregation there, I was exposed to two amazing Israeli educators - Jack Horowitz and his nephew, Gadi. They didn't impose any gender constraints on us as kids. Girls as well as boys were encouraged to lead services. As a result, I experienced a more elastic view of Judaism than many of my contemporaries who grew up in other communities."

When asked what changes she has seen in the acceptance of woman in the Jewish world and modern life, she replies that while women are generally well-accepted in secular and religious leadership roles, there is still a question of equal value for equal work. For example, she questions how often female rabbis are considered for plum positions as compared to their male counterparts.

"And it's just not a matter of equal pay for equal work," she says. "There is also the question of what kind of lives people want to lead and where work fits in."

She says that she is looking forward to the upcoming symposium which, she notes, will be touching on many of the issues that Lilith tries to address. "I will be interested in what the participants in the symposium have to say as we try to determine where we go from here," she says.

Barr says the idea for the symposium arose from a meeting of community leaders a couple of years ago. "Our [the Rady Centre's] executive director Gayle Waxman thought that this would be a great opportunity to bring women together of all ages to exchange ideas, learn from each other and explore different ways women can make a difference in the Jewish and general communities.

"We put together a working committee of women from different Jewish organizations."

"The symposium has attracted a lot of interest," Barr says. "We are expecting a good attendance."

The Jewish Women's Symposium is receiving financial support from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and Women's Philanthropy-Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. ■

St. John's Jewish community one of the oldest in Canada

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Every year before Rosh Hashanah, members of the Jewish community of St. John's, N.L., travel to nearby Cape Spear, the most easterly point of land on the continent, to conduct a Shacharit morning prayer service while overlooking the Atlantic Ocean, thus becoming the first Jews in North America to greet the new year.

That's one of numerous points of distinction of this small Jewish community, which today numbers only a few dozen families. The community may never have been large – it peaked at an estimated 75 to 100 families some time in the 1940s or 1950s – but it is certainly one of the oldest in Canada.

The first Jews arrived in Newfoundland in the 1770s. "They were trading for fish and also seal furs and seal oil, which was used in lamps," said Robin McGrath, author of Salt Fish and Shmattes: History of the Jews of Newfoundland and Labrador from 1770.

Many in the modern community are descended from peddlers and shopkeepers who arrived from Eastern Europe and Russia in the 1910s, 1920s and 1930s, according to Dr. Douglas Wilansky, who was born in St. John's in 1929, the son of a Belarusian-born rabbi and his wife who ran Wilansky and Sons Limited. "My father was the rabbi for a period," he said. "My parents ran the clothing store and my mother also had another store. There were perhaps 10 or 15 Jewish stores in town."

Like many children of immigrants, Dr. Wilansky left Newfoundland in 1949, the year the former British colony became part of Canada. After graduating from medical school, he became founding chief of medicine (emeritus) at Toronto's Etobicoke General Hospital, a position from which he recently retired. But he still goes back to St. John's every year.

As it happens, Claire Frankel-Salama, current president of St. John's Beth El Synagogue, also has strong connections to Toronto. "I'm a Bathurst Street girl," she said, despite the fact that she's lived in St. John's for 30 years. She's a lecturer at Memorial University and her husband, Messod Salama, is a full professor.

"When we came here, it was the tail end of a certain era," she said. "There were a lot of Jewish businesses at one time and there were still some shopkeepers on Water Street. The Holocaust survivors and others who came here after the war sent their kids to universities in Montreal and Toronto, then they followed their kids and left." (Philip Riteman, a Holocaust survivor who stayed, is a renowned public speaker on the Holocaust who was awarded an honorary PhD by Memorial University several years ago.)

Beth El Synagogue. STREETVIEW CAPTURE

A memorable moment in the community's history occurred during the 9/11 crisis of 2001. The community went into full service mode to assist the many Jewish passengers who were stranded when their jets were forced to land here and in Gander.

The synagogue has weekly services and was recently the scene of a Purim party and a lively bat mitzvah last August. But the congregation never rebounded after a group splintered away about 10 years ago and formed a separate organization called Chavura.

Representatives of Chabad have also started visiting in recent years and a Chabad-connected rabbi has even been sending small presents on Jewish holidays, including shmurah matzah at Passover. One year the main shipping route from Sidney N.S. and the mainland was blocked when ice prevented the ferries from crossing the strait, Frankel-Salama recalled. "The only matzah we had for that seder was the matzah from Rabbi Gorelik," she said.

There is a kosher fruit winery on the island, but kosher grape wine must be ordered from Toronto. Kosher beef is hard to come by but a local Sobey's supermarket imports kosher chicken for the community. "We've had struggles moving from Chai to Marvid chicken like everyone else," Frankel-Salama said. "We eat a lot of fish – the fish here is wonderful."

The first Jews to the island came from England in the late 18th century, and historian-writer McGrath found a lot about them in the records of the synagogue in Plymouth, England. Simon Solomon, the first Jew in the St. John's area, was the first postmaster of Newfoundland, she said. "He was also a jeweller and a member of the dissenting church. He came to St. John's from Devon, England in 1792."

A retired Eskimologist who spent 25 years living in Baffin Island, McGrath was born and raised in St. John's, and spoke to The CJN from her current home in Goose Bay, Labrador. Her novel, The Winterhouse, which is salted with the early history of Newfoundland's Jewish community, won a Canadian Jewish Book Award in 2009.

"As a child growing up, the Jews were extremely important to me and my cultural development," she said. "I didn't grow up as a Jew but they were all around me. They were just very interesting, lively, cultured people, adventuresome and cultivated too."

This is the fourth in an occasional series on Jewish life in various small towns across Canada.

The intifadah of the Palestinian Generation Y

'Lone wolf' attacks not driven by religion and seem to be waning

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

Six months have elapsed since the "lone wolf" intifadah began. In those six months, 33 Israelis and foreign nationals have been killed by Palestinian assailants, and there have been roughly 270 terror attacks and attempted terror attacks of various kinds, including shootings, car rammings and stabbings.

Some 200 Palestinians have been killed in the same period, more than two-thirds of them in the act of trying to attack Israelis, and others in clashes with Israeli troops. More than 270 terrorists have participated in these attacks – which amount to more than one per day on average. And yet, some still insist on calling this phenomenon a "wave," perhaps in an attempt to create hope that it will soon disappear.

The wave refuses to disappear, but it has declined significantly in recent weeks. There have been fewer attacks and fewer terrorists setting out to stab people or run them over, and there has been less incitement to carry out such attacks.

It is true that on Fridays, one can still find Palestinian demonstrations against the occupation, but these demonstrations have been taking place since before October 2015, when the violence began.

Just for comparison's sake, 62 terror attacks (or attempted attacks) were recorded in October 2015, according to Israel's defence establishment, including shootings, stabbings, rammings and bombs. Forty-eight were recorded in November, 45 in December, 26 in January 2016, 30 in February and 20 in March (as of March 30).

While the drop in numbers is, of course, significant and encouraging, the March figure is still at least four times greater than the average number of attacks that took place in the months that preceded this current wave of terror.

So why call this an intifadah when it bears no resemblance whatsoever to the characteristics of the first and second ones?

The word "intifadah" loosely translates as a kind of outburst or shaking off. It seems that a kind of outburst or "shaking off" has been taking place here: hundreds of young Palestinians, 20-something on average, have attempted to shake off anything that resembles the society and the place in which they live. They are trying to shake off the traditional patriarchal framework where their father and the clan chief tell them what to do, the Palestinian organizations that have led them to destruction, the loathed Palestinian Authority (PA) , and, of course, the Israeli occupation.

Palestinian youths take part in an anti-Israel protest in the southern Gaza Strip town of Rafah on Oct. 13, 2015. ABED RAHIM KHATIB/FLASH90

This is the intifadah of the Palestinian Generation Y – all those young men with styling gel in their hair, talking on smartphones, and following Facebook and other social networks, but drawing inspiration from the mosque, from the television channels of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, from the buzz on the street, from the pool hall or from school, sometimes out of a desire to imitate their friends who committed terror attacks.

But in recent weeks and perhaps months, we have seen that the "flag of the revolution" that this generation bears does not attract other parts of the Palestinian population; the vast majority have stayed home. While those on "the street" may see those who perpetrate terror attacks as heroes, they are in no rush to go out and get killed in the sort of attack that typifies this new intifadah.

Maybe the media outlets that identify with Fatah put it best when they used the Arabic word hibah, "outbreak." It is not an actual intifadah, but rather an unplanned, spontaneous outbreak of young people who are not led by any particular organization; they are young people with no leadership and certainly no strategic or tactical plan.

It is difficult to describe or typify these young people in a single word. They are not particularly poor or deprived. They come from many different parts of the West Bank, except for the large refugee camps. Some of them come from well-to-do families; most do not.

Perhaps what stands out the most about them is that many (at least those who were arrested and interviewed) hoped or believed perpetrating a terror attack would increase their prestige in Palestinian society. They expected to become the heroes of the village or the neighbourhood from which they came.

The "lone wolf" intifadah was at first attributed to an Islamic aspect linked to the incidents on the Temple Mount. Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel's trip to pray there in September 2015, which was circulated in a YouTube video, played a starring role on the Palestinian social networks. More and more terrorists went out to commit attacks, mainly in Jerusalem, in order to "defend Al-Aqsa." But after just a few weeks, the Temple Mount fell from the headlines and Hebron took the lead in the growing number of attacks, especially stabbing attacks.

When young Palestinians were asked why knives had become the symbol of this intifadah, they cited availability. Knives were a weapon found in every home, like cars, which were used in ramming attacks – and, less commonly, the homemade or craft-produced Carl Gustav submachine gun, or "Carlo," the most popular in the territories.

Anyone trying to lump the Islamic State's (IS) terror attacks in Europe together with the terror attacks coming out of the Palestinian territories ended up with a misrepresentation that was far from reality. Religious zeal is not the leading factor here.

So what made them go out to commit terror attacks? Perhaps their uncertain economic situation, nationalistic motives and the lack of hope, as well as the personal psychological motive. But as odd and, perhaps, slightly sick as it may sound, the main reason was a desire for social prestige, a wish to be "cool."

All too many young Palestinians wanted to become shahids – martyrs – like their friends who had gone before them. They saw how an entire society glorified the phenomenon (mainly in the first months of the intifadah), the glowing reports on the various television channels, the posters, the status bestowed on families whose sons had been killed during terror attacks – they wanted to be part of it as well. The attacks were their way of climbing up from the bottom of the social ladder to the status of a hero or heroine.

A statistic that may explain quite a bit about these young people's motives is the noted decrease in the number of young Palestinians in the Hebron area who committed suicide for psychological reasons over the past half year.

The Islamic motive among the attackers is far from strong. It is mostly a myth created around this outbreak – and perhaps this is the place to mention the assumptions that became entrenched among the leaders of the political echelon and, following that, the general public.

Corruption probe will topple government: Liberman

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israel's former foreign minister Avigdor Liberman said on April 2 that the recently announced corruption investigations into two senior lawmakers will destabilize the political system and bring down Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's governing coalition before the end of 2016.

A once staunch ally of the prime minister, Liberman asserted during a cultural event in Modi'in that the graft probe into Interior Minister Aryeh Deri would unseat Netanyahu's coalition, which has only a narrow Knesset majority. The investigation into opposition leader Isaac Herzog would also contribute to destabilizing the Knesset, he added.

The hawkish Yisrael Beytenu party chairman said he had no intention of joining Netanyahu's government to prevent its collapse, and predicted new general elections would be called in the coming months.

In recent years Liberman himself has been at the centre of several corruption allegations, though he was acquitted of criminal activity in a 2013 trial. In 2014 several of his party members were hit with a raft of criminal charges in a massive police investigation into alleged systemic, pervasive corruption.

Last week, it was revealed that a criminal investigation would be launched against Deri for allegedly failing to properly report real estate property to authorities. Deri served 22 months in prison from 2000 to 2002 after he was convicted of taking bribes while serving as interior minister, and returned to politics earlier this decade to lead the ultra-Orthodox party in the Knesset.

A day later, it was announced that Herzog, who heads the opposition Zionist Union list, was under investigation for financial irregularities during his 2013 campaign to take over the Labor party.

Both lawmakers flatly denied the allegations, and have vowed to fully co-operate with police in the respective investigations.

Liberman also spoke April 2 of the highly contentious shooting of a disarmed Palestinian assailant by an IDF solider, saying the defence establishment should stand by the solider even if he made an error in judgement.

"In the current situation, it's impossible to expect that a solider will always make the right decisions. He must be supported, even if was wrong," he said.

The soldier, whose name is being withheld from publication, is being investigated by the Military Police and is set to face manslaughter charges, but has been vociferously defended by some sectors of Israeli society.

"I don't know if he is a hero, but he certainly is no murderer," Liberman said of the infantryman.

Last month, the Kfir Brigade soldier was filmed shooting a wounded and nearly motionless Palestinian assailant in the head some 10 minutes after the attacker had already been shot and incapacitated.

He was arraigned a day later on suspicion of murder, drawing anger from his family, right-wing politicians and others who claimed the army was passing judgment before fully probing the incident.

The IDF launched an investigation into the shooting immediately, and a day later the army prosecutor said he was considering murder charges against the soldier. Army prosecutors have since indicated that the soldier may only face charges of manslaughter, not murder.

In Israel, the incident quickly escalated into a national debate about the IDF's rules of engagement and its use of force in regards to Palestinians.

Throughout the week, thousands of Israelis demonstrated across the country in defence of the soldier, demanding his release from custody.

Liberman, who attended a rally outside the Qastina military court last week, claimed there was no basis for the accusations against the soldier, saying he was "sure" the soldier would be acquitted of the charges against him.

He went on to attack Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon, who earlier in the week leveled harsh criticism against lawmakers who had expressed support for the soldier.

Ya'alon, senior IDF officials as well as Netanyahu, have defended the decision to probe the soldier and insisted that his actions may have violated the army's ethical code. ■

Palestinian likely still alive when shot by IDF soldier

AVI ISSACHAROFF AND TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF, JERUSALEM

Palestinian official said an assailant shot through the head by an Israeli soldier in Hebron last month was injured but alive before the bullet pierced his brain

The Palestinian pathologist attended but did not perform the autopsy April 3 in Tel Aviv on Abdel Fattah al-Sharif, whose death, caught on camera, is at the centre of a case that has roiled Israeli public opinion and the halls of power after an Israeli soldier apparently killed the wounded and supine assailant.

"After a full autopsy, the fatal wound was in the head," the Palestinian doctor, Rayan al-Ali, told AFP.

"There were several gunshot wounds. All those wounds were in the muscles, the lower limbs, and there was a wound in his right lung, but it was not fatal and did not lead to his death."

The Israeli findings, which are also central to whether the soldier will be charged with manslaughter in a military court, have not yet been made public, but Israeli officials did not disagree with the Palestinian doctor's findings, according to a Ha'aretz report.

The soldier under investigation, whose name has not been released, was filmed shooting Sharif through the head on March 24, minutes after Sharif and another assailant stabbed and moderately wounded a soldier in Tel Rumeida, an Israeli enclave of the West Bank city of Hebron.

The other Palestinian assailant was killed when troops shot at the two in an effort to stop the attack. In some videos, Sharif can be seen moving his legs as he lay wounded on the ground, before being shot in the head.

He was arrested quickly afterward and a prosecutor said initially said he would seek murder charges against the soldier. However, at a hearing last week the prosecutor said they would seek manslaughter charges instead.

The incident sparked a national controversy with some politicians and others accusing the army of selling out the soldier by arresting him and putting him under investigation. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon and army brass have all defended the investigation.

It is not clear why the soldier, who arrived on the scene several minutes after the stabbing incident, decided to shoot Sharif.

IDF prosecutors say evidence points to the intention to kill Sharif despite the fact that the stabber had been subdued and lay apparently helpless on the ground. The soldier has argued that Sharif was moving, and said he believed the Palestinian could have been carrying an explosive vest or other device that posed a threat to bystanders.

According to prosecutors, the autopsy will provide critical evidence that may corroborate or undermine the soldier's defence.

The High Court of Justice last week agreed to a request by Sharif's family to allow a pathologist of the family's choosing to attend the autopsy.

The soldier was released from Military Police custody on April 1 on the order of the Jaffa court and moved to supervised detention at a military base.

The prosecution has said that the soldier was not co-operating with investigators, even though his lawyers initially said he had promised to re-enact the shooting and confront the soldiers who testified against him, the Ynet news website said.

"He refused to hold a reenactment, and even indicated that he did not remember things that were said by witnesses at the scene," said the Military Advocate General's appeal of the soldier's release.

The appeal added that "the soldier claimed several times during investigation that the attacker tried to reach for a knife that was 'within reaching distance,' while the video [of the incident] paints a different picture, that the knife was a significant distance from the attacker, who was himself in serious condition. He gave evasive answers during investigation whenever he was confronted with anomalies in his version of events. The soldier's [shifting] version raises serious doubts about the credibility of the defense arguments, to say the least."

Netanyahu on March 31 urged the family of the soldier to trust in the Military Police investigation currently underway.

"I heard your words and as the father of a soldier, I understand your distress," Netanyahu told the father in a phone call.

"I trust the IDF, the chief of staff and the investigation 100 per cent and I think that you too should trust the commanders and the investigation," he said. "I am convinced that the investigation will be professional and fair toward your son."

At a press conference held at their Ramle home last week, the soldier's family angrily denounced his "lynching" in the media and said Israeli leaders were too quick to judge him before he had an opportunity to defend himself. ■

Some 1,000 students said to be attending illegal Jewish schools in London

JTA
LONDON

A London firm working with a local education authority said that it had destroyed evidence that Jewish children were being educated in illegal faith schools.

The reports about cheders – informal haredi Orthodox Jewish schools, some of them operating without permit and teaching only scripture instead of the national curriculum – located in the London borough of Hackney appeared April 3 in The Independent.

According to the report, employees of the Hackney Learning Trust, a private firm working for the municipal council of Hackney, in 2010 informed a municipal official that the firm had destroyed evidence of the attendance of pupils in cheders at the request of Jewish educational institutions.

In the meeting, Trust representatives said that they had asked legal Jewish state schools – which teach scripture in addition to the required curriculum – to inform the Trust when a child was taken away by their parents to attend an illegal one instead. But some of the schools threatened legal action against the Trust, prompting it to back down and agree to destroy all evidence it collected on the issue.

The minutes of the 2010 meeting record that a senior department for education staff member was present at the meeting and had agreed to inform the department of all that was discussed.

According to The Independent, some 1,000 children are currently missing from schools in London and may be attending illegal faith schools.

Rabbi Jonathan Romain, chair of the Accord Coalition which links religious and secular groups to promote inclusive education, told The Independent: "There has long been an open secret in the Jewish world that ultra-Orthodox schools have been operating in Hackney and are not registered with the department of education. In essence, they are illegal schools, but authorities appear to be turning a blind eye."

A spokesperson for the department of education said: "Nothing is more important than keeping children safe. It is the local authority's responsibility to investigate allegations of abuse and neglect and they take these seriously." ■

Israel must accept non-Rabbinate Orthodox conversions, Supreme Court rules

JTA
TEL AVIV

Israel's Supreme Court ruled that the state must recognize Orthodox conversions performed in Israel outside the authority of the Chief Rabbinate.

The March 31 ruling means any non-citizen who converts in a private Israeli Orthodox conversion court can gain Israeli citizenship under the country's Law of Return. Previously, converts could only gain Israeli citizenship if they converted outside of Israel and lived in a Diaspora Jewish community. Foreign conversions do not need to be Orthodox.

Some 150 citizens who have converted in private Israeli Orthodox conversion courts will now be seen as Jewish by the state.

The court rejected the state's claim that only Chief Rabbinate conversions may be considered legitimate within Israel. Because of the Jewish community's multi-faceted nature, the court ruled, any conversion performed by any Orthodox community, whether in Israel or abroad, should be recognized as valid.

"The Jewish nation is indeed one nation, but it is spread out across the world, and is composed of communities, layers and sub-layers," the court's decision read. Recognizing only the Chief Rabbinate "does not attribute weight to the existing range of Jewish communities – and that is unacceptable."

The decision is largely symbolic for Israeli citizens, as those it affects will not gain any more rights or privileges. But Rabbi Seth Farber, who is active in Giyur Kahalacha, a network of private Orthodox conversion courts, said the ruling could open the door to the Chief Rabbinate allowing converts from private courts to marry in Israel.

"As long as the Interior Ministry wouldn't recognize them, the Rabbinate didn't have a choice whether to recognize them," Rabbi Farber said. "This says we recognize you as part of the Jewish collective."

Judaism for the purposes of immigration is determined by the Interior Ministry. The Chief Rabbinate controls Jewish ritual within Israel, such as marriage, divorce and burial. ■

ANALYSIS

For young Palestinians, the PA is irrelevant

It should be emphasized that the Israeli security forces gave no support at all to these myths or basic assumptions that politicians and media personalities, mainly from the right, constantly invoke.

Decision-makers in the Israeli government and the right-wing parties have said time and again that incitement by the PA and its president Mahmoud Abbas were responsible for the violent outbreak. While this statement is not completely accurate, it is not divorced from reality either. There is plenty of incitement in the Palestinian media, including from outlets belonging to the PA and Fatah's Facebook pages. But – and this is a big "but" – this incitement is not the main reason, or even one of the main reasons, for what has been happening here over the past several months.

Young Palestinians have become fed up with the PA and do not watch or follow its media outlets or those of Fatah. It is true that Abbas has not condemned the terror attacks, but in reality, few young Palestinians care in the slightest whether he condemns them or not. Abbas did not encourage terror attacks, and he also did not state clearly that he opposed them. One of the toughest problems that the State of Israel has to deal with is that Palestinian teenagers care nothing about what the positions of the Palestinian Authority or its leader may be.

On the other hand, almost everyone who (justly) criticized the PA for its part in encouraging terror attacks has ignored the critical role it played in stopping terror attacks. The PA has prevented dozens of stabbing, ramming and shooting attacks during these past six months, arrested Hamas and Islamic Jihad operatives who had been planning serious attacks inside the Green Line, and recently, at least, even prevented popular demonstrations against Israel.

This is the PA's dual role and Israel's dilemma: the PA engages in incitement on the one hand, but in preventing attacks on the other. This can also be seen in the ambiguous policy of Abbas himself, who says at every turn that he is opposed to violence, but refuses to condemn the terror attacks in the current intifadah. Yet in recent months, even he has realized the danger that a deterioration on the ground will bring, mainly when Hamas is the one trying to take advantage of it in order to weaken the PA.

It is also the reason why Abbas made members of Fatah's youth movement cease the demonstrations that they had been leading in recent weeks, and why, in recent months, he gave clearer orders to his security agencies to try and prevent terror attacks.

The tone coming out of Ramallah has changed and this can be reflected in the fact that the situation on the ground is calming down. The most outstanding example of this is the PA's attempts to embark on PR campaigns in places disposed to trouble such as Qabatiya, near Jenin, and Sa'eer, near Hebron. The PA's intensive PR activity in schools in these villages has stopped a number of people from setting out to commit terror attacks. The incitement from Fatah- and PA-owned media outlets has weakened as well, though it has not stopped completely.

The bottom line is that, however unfortunately for politicians on the right who may wish differently, the State of Israel still needs Abbas' help in dealing with the escalation in the West Bank.

Of course, the decrease in the number of attacks is not due to the PA's actions alone. Credit must be given to the Israeli side as well.

The highly cautious behaviour on the part of Israel in terms of affecting ordinary life of the Palestinian population as a whole prevented a large-scale deterioration and kept the Palestinian public from joining in. But beyond that, the incidents of this escalation or outbreak also threw into sharp relief the large differences between the approaches of Israel's political echelon and those of its defence establishment.

If the former sought to blame the PA and its leader for the situation, the latter saw that the PA was playing a critical role in calming things down. The defence establishment also favoured keeping various relief measures in place and avoiding causing harm to the population as a whole.

The defence establishment also refuses to go along with the myth being promulgated by some right-wing politicians, that IS and radical Islam are at the centre of this intifadah. As far as home demolitions, there is agreement between the political and defence echelons that they are at least a partial deterrent, but there is still dispute when it comes to the issue of holding on to the terrorists' bodies. While Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan and others see this as an effective measure in the fight against terrorism, defence officials fear that doing so could lead to a renewed escalation in violence.

But the toughest debate between the political and defence echelons is about the measures that should be taken to bring the outbreak to an end – in other words, the peace process.

While the defence establishment believes that more gestures must be made toward the PA and the Palestinian population, including resuming peace talks, the Israeli government is almost sweepingly opposed to that stance, certainly as far as talks with the PA are concerned. Does that stem only from disagreement on pure security issues or from a conflict between a professional approach to the issue and political decision-makers seeking to placate their voters? Either way, it does not seem that the dispute will be resolved anytime soon.

Despite the ebbing of the current outbreak, quite a few elements on the ground are working to revive it and even bring about an even bigger escalation. Hamas is, of course, first among them. The same group that is keeping things relatively quiet in the Gaza Strip is doing everything possible to make the situation worse in the West Bank.

For example, the defence establishment has prevented 140 significant terror attacks since Oct. 1, 2015, including shootings, kidnappings, bombings and suicide attacks. Hamas was responsible for most of them.

The murder of the three Israeli teenagers kidnapped in 2014 led to a severe deterioration in Gaza and finally to war. Now we can only imagine what would happen if several of the terror attacks that were prevented over the past half-year had taken place. What would have happened if the Hamas cell that was uncovered in Abu Dis roughly two months ago had succeeded in committing the suicide attack inside Israel that it planned?

The bad news does not end with Hamas and its efforts to undermine the situation in the West Bank. The future of the PA seems particularly bleak. The current violence has proved in many ways how much Abbas' era in the territories is over, and how badly the path he led toward a peace agreement with Israel failed. He himself no longer believes that it is possible to reach a peace agreement with Israel (as long as Netanyahu is in power), and for many young Palestinians, he and the PA are no longer relevant.

No one can guess what will happen the day after Abbas steps down. After hinting over the past year that he might resign, he now says that he has no intention of doing so. But he turned 81 last week, and public support for him is very weak. If he should step down from the presidency for whatever reason, it will take some time until Fatah manages to appoint a successor who will stabilize the system – if Fatah manages to do so at all.

The worst news of all, at least for some of the people in Israel and on the Palestinian side, may be that the two-state solution has been shelved. No one in the Palestinian or the Israeli leadership really believes that a peace agreement based upon two states can be reached anytime soon. Even if the leaders of both sides were to arrive at such an agreement, with more than 400,000 Jews living in settlements, the scenario of an Israeli pullout from Judea and Samaria seems unrealistic.

On the Palestinian side, at least, people everywhere, particularly young people, are expressing major support for the idea of "one state for two peoples," even if that state should be called Israel at first. As they see it, in another few decades, with a solid Palestinian majority, the name of the state can be changed to the State of Israstine. And, come the day, just Palestine. ■

Kids will love these breakfast ideas

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When my kids were young, the most difficult thing about Passover, food-wise, was what to make for breakfasts. Lunches and dinners were easy to plan, but breakfasts were another whole story. During the run-up to Passover, they looked forward to matzah brei, but after a few days of it their reaction was, "Oh, not that again."

Waffles, pancakes, toast, bagels, muffins, even most cereals – they're all off limits during the weeklong holiday. Most of the kosher for Passover cereals are pretty bad. So what's to eat for breakfast? Here are some ideas that I think your kids will love.

French toast made with slices of sponge cake. Omelette with chopped lox and a healthy dollop of cream cheese added just before the fold.

Geshmirte matzah

- 1/2 cup milk
- 4 matzah squares
- 16 oz. soft cream cheese
- 1/2 cup sour cream
- 1/2 cup sugar
- 1 tbsp. potato starch
- juice of half a lemon
- 3 eggs
- 1 tbsp. cinnamon-sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Pour the milk into a large shallow dish and lay the matzah squares in one at a time, turning to soak both sides. Set each matzah on a greased cookie sheet. Beat together the cream cheese, sour cream, sugar, potato starch, lemon juice and eggs until smooth. Spoon onto matzah, spreading to cover. Sprinkle with cinnamon-sugar. Bake for 10 to 15 minutes, until puffed and lightly browned. Remove from oven; cut each matzah into 9 squares. Makes 8 servings.

Pizza omelette

- 3 eggs
- salt and pepper, to taste
- marinara, tomato sauce or ketchup
- mozzarella cheese, shredded cheddar cheese, shredded olives, herbs or toppings of choice

Whisk eggs well. Season with salt and pepper. Heat a 7-in. frying pan* with cooking spray or butter. Pour egg mixture into pan and let it cook until it sets around the edges. Flip the omelette, taking care that it does not break. Remove the omelette from the pan and set on a baking sheet. Top with tomato sauce, cheese and toppings of your choice. Bake at 400 until cheese is browned and bubbly.

*If you use a bigger pan, you may want to add a few more eggs to keep the "crust" substantial. If it's too thin, the pizza will fall apart.

Four ingredient Passover pancakes

- ❑ 2 large eggs (or 1 extra-large egg)
- ❑ 1 ripe banana
- ❑ 2 tbsp. almond butter
- ❑ 1 tsp. cinnamon

Optional Toppings:

- ❑ chocolate chips
- ❑ blueberries
- ❑ toasted coconut
- ❑ pure maple syrup

Heat a griddle or nonstick skillet over medium heat until very hot, around 3-5 minutes.

In a bowl, mash the banana with a fork. Whisk in the eggs then add the almond butter and cinnamon and stir to combine. You can add chocolate chips, blueberries or anything else you can think of to the batter.

With an ice cream scoop or large spoon, pour the batter on to the skillet and cook on one side until bubbles form around the edges of the pancakes, about 3 minutes, then flip and cook for 1 minute. Remove the cooked pancakes from the skillet, stack, top with pure maple syrup and other fun toppings and eat! Makes 8-10 pancakes.

Homemade Nutella

Your children will love this spread on matzah.

- ❑ 8 oz skinned* and roasted hazelnuts (unsalted), about 1 1/2 cups
- ❑ 1 8-oz. bag chocolate chips
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
- ❑ pinch of sea salt

Melt the chocolate chips over a double boiler. While they are melting, add the hazelnuts to a food processor and blend until smooth and creamy, scraping down the sides of the bowl as needed. Add the melted chocolate, vanilla and salt and blend until incorporated. Store in an airtight container at room temperature for up to 1 week, or refrigerate for up to 1 month. Makes about 3 cups.

*If you cannot find skinned hazelnuts, purchase raw nuts and roast them at 400 degrees for about 8-10 minutes, until the skins begin to crack. Remove from the oven and add to a kitchen towel. Rub the nuts vigorously to remove the skins and set aside to cool.

Note: When the Nutella comes out of the food processor, it will be liquidy, like the consistency of melted chocolate. As it sits, it will firm up to the texture of nut butter. If you refrigerate the spread, it will harden, but you can just bring it to room temperature so it's easier to spread.

Equipment Note: You will need a powerful food processor in order to create the hazelnut butter. If your machine is not that good, the process may take longer, just be patient and let the machine do the work.

Tip: If your Nutella is difficult to spread, place your sealed container in a bowl of very warm tap water to soften. ■

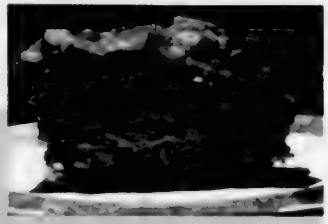
Pickle dishes your family will relish

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Pickles are a "dill-ight." A crisp, tangy pickle prepares the palate for food yet to come. The acid in a pickle cuts through the richness of meat or cheese, while the sweet and spicy flavour balances and complements it.

A pickle is a fruit or vegetable that's preserved through acidity. We are most familiar with cucumbers that are preserved in a solution of vinegar, salt and flavourings such as garlic and dill. Before refrigeration, pickling was the only way to preserve food for safe consumption.

In many cultures, pickles are key to cooking. Prized for their unique flavours and textures, pickled foods frequently appear as condiments or essential components of many dishes. Give these recipes a go, and you will find yourself in a fine pickle.



Pickle meatloaf

- 3 lb. ground beef or chicken
- 2 tbsp. onion, grated
- 1 cup matzah meal
- 3/4 cup bottled kosher dill pickle liquid
- 3 eggs
- 1/2 tsp. pepper

Glaze:

- 1 cup finely chopped kosher dill pickles
- 1 cup ketchup
- 1/2 cup water

Preheat 350 oven. Prepare two loaf pans either sprayed or greased with vegetable oil. Mix ground meat mixture with onion, matzah meal, dill pickle liquid, eggs and pepper until well blended. Divide into the two loaf pans. Bake for 1 hour.

Combine chopped dill pickles, ketchup, water, and pour over loaf. Bake for an additional 15 minutes. Let sit for 5 minutes before slicing.

Kosher dill pickle soup

- 1 large onion, finely chopped
- 1 stalk celery, finely chopped
- 1 carrot, finely chopped
- 1 clove garlic, finely chopped
- 2 tbsp. olive oil
- 1/2 cup dill pickle liquid
- 4 cups chicken or vegetable broth
- 1/2 cup finely chopped dill pickles
- 2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
- salt and pepper

In a large pot, over medium heat, soften the vegetables in the oil for about 5 minutes. Season lightly with salt and pepper. Deglaze the pot with the pickle liquid. Add the broth and the dill pickles. Bring to a boil. Cover, reduce the heat and simmer gently for about 20 minutes.

CHAG SAME'ACH from YITZ'S

It's not Passover without it

SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's an integral part of Pesach for many people. There is no special plate. There isn't even a brachah over it! Can you guess this well-known part of Pesach?

It's sponge cake.

Sponge cake comes in two types – angel food and true sponge. Angel food cake has cream of tartar, an acid ingredient, which used to be combined with baking soda and salt to make a form of baking powder before baking powder was produced commercially. Cream of tartar is what gives the angel food cake the pure white colour, and it also creates an acid reaction in the batter.

Sponge cake has a more delicate cousin referred to as sunshine cake. Most people, however, refer to the Passover version as sponge cake.

Sponge cake is usually baked without shortening or butter or baking powder but with lots of eggs. Its lightness and texture come from careful handling and the air beaten into the eggs. Recipes with nine to 12 eggs are not uncommon.

The aim of making a sponge cake is to beat the maximum amount of air into the yolks and whites while handling them as little as possible to retain the air. Eggs should be room temperature when beaten. An electric or rotary beater gives better results than whipping by hand. Since there is no baking powder, the main rising factor is the air plus steam.

In making a sponge cake, it is important that the yolks are beaten until light and thick, and the whites must be beaten until they are stiff and glossy. Essences such as vanilla lemon or orange rind add special flavour to a sponge cake.

The best pan for a sponge cake is a tube pan with removable rim. Thus the central tube gives support to the batter.

In Israel, many oldtimers use a wonder pot (sir pella) about which I wrote a cookbook in the 1970s for people without an oven (and reprinted recently for those whose cookbook was lost or had fallen apart). It is basically a sponge cake pan that sits upon a coned base and then has a lid with strategic holes around its top to let out the steam. It is placed on a burner atop the stove for baking.

A regular sponge cake pan should be ungreased. A preheated 350-degree oven is the best heat for baking a sponge cake.

When the cake is done, the pan should be inverted to cool for about an hour and a half. Before removing the cake from the pan, the sides should be loosened with a knife. It is best not to try to cut a fresh sponge cake with a knife, Use a divider with prongs instead, and slide it back and forth gently.

Here are two different kinds of sponge cake.

Miriam's banana cake

This is from one of my close friends in Overland Park, Kansas, who is a really creative cook and is now 88 years old.

- ❑ 7 separated eggs
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 cup mashed bananas
- ❑ 3/4 cup potato starch
- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, beat egg whites until stiff but not dry, then refrigerate.

In another bowl, beat egg yolks until thick and lemon coloured. Gradually add sugar and salt, beating continually.

Fold in bananas and potato starch. Fold in egg whites then nuts. Turn into an ungreased tube pan and bake at 350 for 45-50 minutes. Invert pan to cool.

Orange glazed Sabra sponge cake

- ❑ 1/2 cup unsalted pareve margarine or 1/4 cup +2 tbsp. oil
- ❑ 2/3 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 tsp. orange rind
- ❑ 2 tbsp. Sabra liqueur
- ❑ 3 separated eggs
- ❑ 2 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup potato starch
- ❑ 3 tbsp. Sabra liqueur
- ❑ 4 tsp. orange rind

Preheat oven to 325. In a bowl, cream margarine or oil and sugar. Add 1 tsp. orange rind, 2 tbsp. Sabra and egg yolks and blend.

In another bowl, beat egg whites until stiff, gradually adding 2 tbsp. sugar. Add to creamed mixture gently, then stir in potato starch.

Pour into greased tube pan. Bake at 325 for 45 minutes to one hour. Let cool for at least an hour then gently remove to a plate.

Meantime, in a bowl, combine orange juice, 3 tbsp. Sabra liqueur and 4 tsp. orange rind. While cake is still hot, punch holes around cake with a toothpick and pour over glaze. ■

Chocolate desserts for Passover

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I love creating desserts, especially chocolate desserts. Even when a multi-course meal is served, as it is on the first two nights of Passover, I rarely think twice about serving chocolate for dessert. Chocolate is just one of those ingredients that people seem to obsess over.

Whether it's milk chocolate, semi-sweet or bittersweet chocolate, or one of the more premium chocolate with the cocoa content ranging upwards of 75 per cent, people tend to be passionate about their chocolate.

But why exactly does chocolate arouse such passion? Is it the mouth feel when chocolate exquisitely melts in your mouth, not quite solid and not quite liquid either? Is it the fact that chocolate (really good chocolate, not the impostors that use vegetable shortening instead of cocoa butter) melts at almost exactly body temperature? Is it the aroma of chocolate that hits you just before you swallow it, heady, unctuous and primal? Is it the fact that there are over 400 compounds in the cocoa bean, making it one of the most complex flavours around?

As is true of any passion, there are lots of reasons but no conclusive answer. Perhaps it's best not to analyze it at all or some of the mystery is tarnished. Here are two wonderful Passover chocolate recipes that promise to satisfy those chocolate cravings, whether it's after the seder meal, or at any other time during the holidays.

Rich fudgy Passover brownies

These brownies fall squarely in the fudgy camp; they're dense and chocolaty, with a thin crust on the surface. They must be fully cooled before eating.

- 8 oz. kosher for Passover semi-sweet chocolate, chopped
- 1/3 cup unsalted butter, in pieces
- 3/4 cup granulated sugar
- 2 large eggs, at room temperature
- 2 tsp. vanilla powder
- 3 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 tbsp. cocoa powder
- pinch granulated sugar

Preheat the oven to 350. Lightly grease the bottom and sides of an 8-in.square metal cake pan

In a saucepan set over very low heat, melt the chocolate with the butter, stirring only after half of it is melted. Once about 7/8 of the chocolate is melted, remove the pot from the heat, stirring until the chocolate is completely melted. Using a small whisk, whisk in the sugar. One at a time, whisk in the eggs, making sure the first one is fully mixed in before whisking in the second egg. Whisk in the vanilla, potato starch, cocoa powder and salt, again whisking vigorously until the mixture is fully combined.

Scrape the chocolate mixture into the prepared pan. Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 20 to 22 minutes or until the brownies are set on the edges and just set in the centre. Transfer to a wire rack to cool completely. Makes 16 brownies.

Meringue cake

Chocolate hazelnut meringue cake

It's important to cook the meringues just until they're crunchy and crisp on the edges but still somewhat soft in the centre. If they're too crisp throughout, cutting them becomes more difficult. Hazelnuts are a glorious pairing with chocolate, but almonds, pecans and macadamia nuts will also be delicious.

Meringues:

- ❑ 1-1/2 cups hazelnuts
- ❑ 6 large egg whites, at room temperature
- ❑ 1 tsp. lemon juice
- ❑ pinch salt
- ❑ 1-1/2 cups granulated sugar
- ❑ 1 cup mini chocolate chips

Ganache:

- ❑ 1 cup whipping cream or dairy free whip topping
- ❑ 8 oz. kosher for Passover semi-sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped

Topping:

- ❑ 1-1/2 cups whipping cream or dairy free whip topping

Preheat the oven to 350. Spread the hazelnuts on an unlined rimmed baking sheet. Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 8 to10 minutes or until lightly browned Let the nuts cool slightly. Transfer the hazelnuts to a kitchen towel and rub vigorously to remove as much of the skin as possible. Chop the nuts coarsely and set aside. Line two large rimmed baking sheets with parchment paper. Draw two 8-in. circles on one sheet and one 8-in. circle on the second. Turn the paper over so that the circle (s) are visible but the pen or pencil mark is on the underside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the whisk attachment, or using hand held beaters, beat the egg whites with the lemon juice and sugar until soft peaks form. In a thin stream, gradually beat in the sugar until stiff and glossy, but not dry, peaks form. Gently fold in the hazelnuts and chocolate chips.

Divide the meringue evenly among the three traced circles and gently spread evenly to cover the circles. Bake in the middle and top third of the oven for 1-1/2 hours, or until the edges are set and crispy but the middle is a bit softer. Let the meringues cool on the pan on a wire rack. (Meringues can be made up to two days ahead and stored in a dry, cool place.)

Ganache: Bring the whipping cream to a boil. Remove from the heat. Add the chopped chocolate to the cream and whisk until melted and smooth. Let cool slightly.

Remove 2/3 cup of the ganache to another bowl and reserve. Divide the remaining ganache evenly among the three meringues, spreading it evenly. Let set at room temperature.

Topping: Place the reserved 2/3 cup of ganache in the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the whisk attachment. Pour in the 1-1/2 cups of whipping cream. Whip until soft peaks.

Place one of the meringue rounds on a serving plate. Top with one-third of the chocolate whipping cream. Place another meringue on top and spread another third of the chocolate whipping cream. Place the last meringue on top and spread the remaining chocolate whipping cream over the top. Refrigerate for at least 6 hours before serving. Makes 12 servings. ■

Visiting the Jewish cemetery in Penang

NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

"Is it locked?" We approach the wrought iron gates to Penang's historic Jewish cemetery – its name clearly lettered in English. We're in luck – the gate swings open to our touch. As we enter, a Tamil gentleman in shirt and sarong approaches. Turns out he's Selva, the caretaker, a member of the family in charge of tending the property for three generations. His small house abuts the cemetery's wall; his caretaking duties are paid for by the Penang Jewish Cemetery Trust, headquartered in Australia.

Fifteen-odd years ago, a friend and I visited this same plot of land, and we found it distressingly choked with weeds. As we left, my friend, a professor at the local university, handed the elderly caretaker some MR (Malaysian currency), urging her to better care for the grounds.

In recent decades, the large number of NGOs on this island off the Straits of Malacca, have, with the help of history-conscious private citizens, spearheaded a movement to protect and preserve a heritage that mirrors the diverse communities– Jews, Armenians, Chinese, Arabs, Europeans, Indians, Eurasians, Thais, Burmese, Malays – that prospered here after Captain Francis Light founded the East India Company's Penang outpost in 1786.

One tangible result has been the 2008 UNESCO Cultural City World Heritage designation awarded to Penang (and Melaka, further down the coast), protecting from development the old capital of George Town and its pastel prewar houses, quirky winding streets, shaded "five-foot ways" designed to protect pedestrians from the sun and a plethora of houses of worship and elaborate Chinese clan houses, (khongsis). The island's only synagogue closed in 1976, although the original building is well-maintained and "listed," as the British say, by its heritage-conscious owner.

Penangites revere their crazy quilt past. Although the Jewish cemetery does not lie in the protected UNESCO zone, our most recent visit revealed a place that, despite the scorching heat of a March day, was spruce and tidy, its warm walls and tombstones softly shaded with palms and banana trees. We walked among the 100-odd graves, several shaped like ossuaries found in Israel, others square and modern-looking. In this quiet corner of the island, visitors discover evidence of a vanished community, with roots in Baghdad, Persia, India, and Europe.

> In this quiet corner of the island, visitors discover evidence of a vanished community, with roots in Baghdad, Persia, India, and Europe.

Never large – Penang's Jews numbered a dozen families and 172 persons at its height in 1899 – the community's exodus accelerated on the eve of the Japanese invasion in 1941. Many Penang Jews kept going, often to Australia. Local newspapers sometimes run "Last Jew in Penang" features, notably on the death of Mordecai David Mordecai, beloved general manager of Penang's glorious old Eastern&Oriental Hotel.

"Mordy" Mordecai has rested here since 2011. "Gone but not Forgotten" reads the inscription on his grave, the cliché belied by the many heartfelt mentions of the hotel manager penned by the nostalgic Australian teachers who were housed in the E&O annex at the height of the Vietnam War.

Other articles focus on visits of elderly Jews, raised in Penang, who return to pay their respects at the cemetery—a gesture that twins culturally with George Town's Chinese community (the city is 60 per cent ethnic Chinese), where families attend to their ancestors' graves in the yearly Ching Ming Festival.

Our companion on our cemetery visit was Canadian historian Leslie James, who lives in Penang with his Malaysian-born wife, between trips home to their family in Ontario. Retired from the foreign service, James is a fountain of information about Penang's diverse heritage. His usual beat is the Protestant cemetery, where Captain Francis Light's 18th century tomb grandly dominates the scene.

Cemetery tells many tales

Far humbler there is the small grave of Anna Loenowens' husband, a British army clerk; his widow went on to teach princely children in Siam's royal court; her rather fanciful memoirs were eventually transformed into the Broadway hit, The King and I. (The Jody Foster/Chow Yun-Fat film version, Anna, incidentally, was filmed in Penang, the original still being banned in Thailand.)

James explains that the Jewish cemetery is "freehold," established for Penang's Jewish community in perpetuity, a point underlined by new signage. The oldest grave, 1835, belongs to Shosha Levi, believed to have donated the cemetery land to her community.

Still, on an island where so much history has been destroyed in the name of development, uncertainty about the cemetery's future is only natural. On the bright side, there is enthusiasm in heritage quarters for naming the area near the cemetery and the former synagogue at 19 Nagore Rd., after the Jews who lived here, an idea supported by The Penang Heritage Trust.

"They say dead men tell no tales," says James, resuming his easy familiarity with Penang's rich history, as we wander among the rows of tombstones, "but in fact they tell many tales." The tales in the Jewish cemetery are written in stone: heartbreak over the loss of a spouse ("Lizzie Schwarz, beloved wife of Julius Schwarz, born in Rumania, 1871, died in Penang, aged 42 years, 8 months"); the wartime death of a British lieutenant, buried in the section reserved for Cohens and Levis; and an unusual design in stone – two hands arranged in a priestly blessing – symbolizing the burial of a Cohen. Small stones grace many graves.

As we take our leave, Selva gestures us into the shade, proudly showing us the visitor's book. Impressed, we examine the pages and pages of names, addresses, and messages – from Perak (Malaysia), Singapore, Bristol, Calgary, Sydney - even Finland. Visitors frequently express thanks ("for the upkeep") and gratitude for their discovery of this evidence of a vanished community. Many, from east and west, have simply written, "Shalom."

Dignified, smiling, Selva brings water for rinsing our hands. We leave and he closes the gates behind us. Immediately outside, we notice a Hindu shrine, a banyan tree decorated with flowers and garlands—the jumbled proximity of beliefs and cultures are very typically Penang. ■

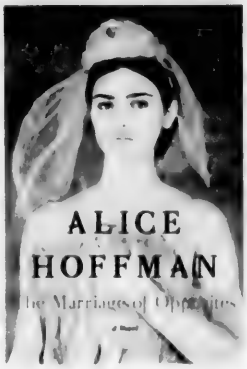
Marriage of Opposites is a captivating, thoughtful, provocative book



The Marriage Of Opposites
By Alice Hoffman
(Simon & Schuster 2015)

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Who among us has not marveled at the luminous paintings of the French impressionists? They revolutionized painting as a visual art form at the turn of the 20th century and their works today still remain among the most popular attractions at art galleries around the world.

One of the master impressionists was Camille Pissarro, considered to be among the movement's founders. Renowned art historian E.H. Gombrich wrote of Pissarro that he was "one of the oldest and most methodical champions of the impressionist movement." Pissarro's radiant landscapes have been described as having "an unaffected naturalism." He was supremely gifted.

In Art: A New History, Paul Johnson succinctly wrote of the talented artist: "Pissarro was a Sephardi Jew from the West Indies who was self-taught but became extraordinarily adept at putting what he saw down on canvas, simply, sincerely and effectively and he tried to work out-of-doors right up to the finish. He was modest but with an inner self-confidence and authority which, in their own way, made him a formidable person and a fine teacher."

In her most recent novel, The Marriage of Opposites, celebrated author Alice Hoffman writes about Pissarro's life. But Pissarro is not the central character of the book. Indeed he does not arrive on the scene until the book's midpoint. His mother Rachel Pomié Petit Pizzarro is the beating heart of The Marriage of Opposites.

Rachel's defiant, passionate, resolute nature, as dramatically imagined by Hoffman, is the artistic springboard of the story. Through Rachel's character, the author launches the reader into a brightly lit corridor that opens onto many connecting chambers dealing with art, religion, philosophy, history, polemics, family relations and individual human destiny.

The story begins on the island of St. Thomas in 1807, some 23 years before the future impressionist painter is born. We meet young Rachel whose relationship with her mother is deeply troubled. Their relationship deteriorates as Rachel blossoms into womanhood and her aspirations clash with her mother's expectations.

Rachel's connection with her father, however, is better. Out of an abiding sense of duty and loyalty to him, Rachel even agrees to a marriage he has arranged with a widowed father of three, in order to save the family's failing business. Rachel's sentiments were not a factor in her father's calculations. But the marriage to Isaac Petit sets in motion a series of events that ultimately brings his nephew, Frederic Pizzarro, onto the island.

Rachel and Frederic meet and their worlds are forever altered. The two fall immediately in love. They marry despite the objections of family and community elders who shun the young couple with cold callousness for having violated the norms of traditional Jewish communal life on the island. Among Rachel and Frederic's children is Jacobo Camille Pizzarro.

Marriage of Opposites is a captivating, thoughtful, provocative book.

The story is an entrancing narrative of many intersecting lines. We meet strong, robustly developed characters, all of whom directly or indirectly influence the unfolding drama of Rachel's eventful life. And yet, the full extent of the inter-connections among them all is not revealed until very late in the novel. And we are surprised as well as delighted at these clever conclusions.

Like the artist whose life she describes and who layered myriad shades, tones, hues and textures of related colours, Hoffman also joins many diverse but related subjects on her literary canvas.

She explores the history of the persecuted Jews of Spain and Portugal who sought sanctuary from the Inquisition, even in the 18th century, as far away as the West Indies islands.

Hoffman describes the severely structured lives the tiny Jewish minority lead on St. Thomas and what it was like for strong-willed and independent individuals, especially women such as Rachel, to resist some of those rules. Women were bereft of legal rights that allowed them to determine their own economic destinies.

She exposes the inhumanity of even seemingly benign systems of slavery, such as the one that existed in St. Thomas in the early 1800s.

She imagines the dreamy motivations and inspirations that bred in Camille Pissarro his rare abilities.

Throughout the book, Hoffman uses lovely, lilting language that achieves somewhat in literary textual form what the Pissarro achieved with his brush and palette. For example, when Frederic arrives in St. Thomas, she describes the tiny roomlet he occupied. "In his current room there was a single window that let in more sunlight than had streamed through all of the windows in his family's home in France combined. Here, every day was a joy, bathed in light."

But most powerfully, Hoffman reflects upon the essence of individual existence. How do we pursue our own dreams when our freedoms are curtailed by responsibility, duty, commitment and a sense of powerlessness? How can we reconcile what we owe to ourselves with what we owe to others? To the world? And what of love? Is it a chimera, a compromise that most people accept as a means to stability and security? Or is it the essence of what gives our lives their deepest meaning?

Hoffman boldly shares her own opinions with us. For example, when it is time for Rachel to say a last farewell to the family maid – the woman who had more or less raised her – Rachel says. "I had whispered a single question to Adelle before she passed on. What is life without love? That was when she took my hand in her own, though she was as frail and weightless as a bird. She made a circle within my palm. I knew what she was telling me. A life like that was worth nothing at all."

Camille Pissarro, perhaps summoning subconsciously upon the psalms he undoubtedly recited in his early youth, wrote: "Blessed are they who see beautiful things in humble places, where other people see nothing. Everything is beautiful; all that matters is to be able to interpret. "

Hoffman's Pissarro says in the story, "I felt I had come upon the core of the meaning of life to discover and re-create beauty."

It is a discovery worth joining. ■

Crazy Ex-Girlfriend and the meaning of obsession

Michael Fraiman

Episode seven of Crazy Ex-Girlfriend, the latest Golden Globe–winning, Jewish-led TV comedy, opens on lead character Rebecca Bunch sitting in her car and spying on her crush, a Filipino-American named Josh Chan. And we think, OK I get it; she's the namesake crazy ex-girlfriend, and the show is about how obsessed she is with this dude.

Except beside her is her best friend, Paula, who delivers the line that strikes at the heart of why we're watching this show at all.

"You need to be with Josh," Paula insists. "If not for you, then for me... I need this. My marriage is like The Walking Dead, OK? We are all just trying to get out alive. You and Josh are a love story – it gives me hope."

That thought captures not just the show's own central theme, but also why any of us watch TV at all. Paula is the audience – gripped to social media, curious about others' lives, and, frankly, obsessed with television.

The show, which wraps up its first season this month, has gotten rave reviews from critics – it blends musical numbers with a colourful Kimmy Schmidt-style optimism that insists women can embrace their femininity while still being honest, emotional and hilarious.

In particular, Jewish media have themselves fallen in obsessive love with lead actress and showrunner Rachel Bloom. She's enchanting to watch, yes, but also proud to pepper the show with references to her religion. "Jews talk about being Jewish a lot," she told JTA this March. "They're very aware of their Jewish identity, so in getting specific with the character, it was natural to make Rebecca own that Jewishness."

But amid all the accolades and praise, the show's most fascinating quality has gone largely unmentioned – that is, its meta-commentary on the nature of public obsession.

Crazy Ex-Girlfriend tells the story of Rebecca Bunch, who, in a fit of deep-seated depression, quits her high-profile Manhattan law firm and moves to West Covina, Calif., after a chance encounter with Josh. (The two only dated for one summer during camp – just the latest example of great Jewish summer camp love stories we're getting these days.)

It's a profoundly irresponsible move indicating a deeper life crisis. As Lisa A. Phillips has commented in New York Magazine, the show aptly presents her unrequited love as signalling "deeper things in our lives."

But Bunch's obsession is only the most superficial of the show's psychological web. Paula sometimes literally watches Rebecca's life unfold onscreen: At one point Rebecca hooks up a hidden camera to her dress, allowing Paula to spend an entire evening ignoring her family and watching the comedy on her smartphone.

Then there's Greg, Josh's best friend, who reluctantly falls for Bunch himself, and who constantly comes back to her despite knowing she doesn't return his feelings (epitomized by the terrific Fred Astaire-style musical number, Settle for Me, pictured above).

It's no coincidence that Bunch's neighbour is a psychology student whose first instincts are to study Bunch, nor that numerous episodes deal with prescription drugs and people trying to cover up how weird it is to care so much. Even Bunch's boss has a song about how much he wishes he could express his love for his daughter – "I love my daughter, but not in a creepy way," he croons.

In short, though I never thought I'd make this observation about a CW network program, this show is a deeply psychological experience. It addresses head-on that people care deeply about people, things, storylines, characters; and yet, to admit it publicly, we're suddenly vulnerable. But really, who's crazier – the crazy ex-girlfriend, or the people obsessively watching her every week? ■

Harmonica wiz gets to play in front of his mentor

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Roni Eytan

Harmonica wizard Roni Eytan is excited about opening for one of his musical heroes, jazz trumpet virtuoso Avishai Cohen, at the Israeli Jazz Showcase in Toronto.

Eytan was attending high school in Jerusalem and enrolled in an after-school music program held at a club called The Yellow Submarine when he first heard Cohen play in performance there. Tel Aviv-born Cohen is part of The Three Cohens, a jazz band he founded with his sister, tenor saxophonist/clarinetist, Anat, and his brother, soprano saxophonist, Yuval. For the past six years, Cohen has played with the all-star jazz ensemble, the SFJAZZ Collective.

"I have all of his records and I'm a fan. For me and my peers, he's someone to look up to," said Eytan, who at 25 is about 13 years younger than Cohen. Eytan added that the trumpet player, whom he also studied with, is still one of his favourite musicians.

Eytan said he picked up the harmonica when he was 15, without any thought of ever playing professionally. "It started as a hobby. I did fall in love with the sound of it. After a few months, I was completely hooked."

He was introduced to jazz at the after-school program. Although jazz bands do feature harmonica players, they are rare in jazz. "The harmonica has yet to be explored," said Eytan, who plays chromatic harmonica. "In the past people didn't take the instrument too seriously."

Eytan's current mentor is jazz harmonica star Gregoire Maret. Both in Israel and at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, where Eytan is in his final year, he's studied with musicians who play various instruments, including the Middle Eastern clarinet.

"That obviously also affected the way I play. I saw it as a privilege to study with saxophone players, trumpet players, piano players. I didn't see it as an obstacle, I just saw it as an opportunity. I think you can make everything work on a different instrument," Eytan said.

Citing a wide range of musical influences, from Herman Look, a Sephardi cantor, to Greek, Latin American and Turkish music, Eytan said that "all of this is coming out organically" in his playing.

At Berklee, he plays with musicians from around the world who have different musical backgrounds. "It has enabled me to play with people who I wouldn't be able to play with in Israel, people coming from countries I can't go to," Eytan said. "I have a very good Iraqi friend, a violinist who's a collaborator of mine. I play with musicians from all over the Middle East."

Eytan said the accomplished musicians he's studied and played with, among them pianist Danilo Perez, whose band he appeared with at Koerner Hall in Toronto last year, have influenced his playing and writing.

After being a sideman in various bands and being fortunate enough to play with incredible musicians, Eytan said it was time to form his own group. At the Israeli Jazz Showcase, the Roni Eytan Quartet is featured and the harmonica will be up front and centre.

The band – including Lefteris Kordis on piano and keyboards, Tamir Shmerling on bass and Dor Herskovits on drums – will play Eytan's and Kordis' compositions. ■

The Israeli Jazz Showcase, featuring the Roni Eytan Quartet and the Avishai Cohen Quartet, takes place at 8:30 p.m. at the Rex Jazz and Blues Bar on April 10. Admission is $20. Presented by Toronto Downtown Jazz and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, with support from the Consulate General of Israel, the Israeli Jazz Showcase is part of the Spotlight on Israeli Culture. Show offers a lifeline for children with serious illnesses

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A show at Roy Thomson Hall, in support of Chai Lifeline, brings together three Jewish superstars performing music that reflects their diverse backgrounds.

Yiddish singer Mike Burstyn, Cantor Itzhak Meir Helfgot and Cantor Simon Spiro share a stage for the first time in British, Yiddish & Kiddush, for what should be a historic show in the world of Jewish music.

A Yiddish entertainer who cuts across musical genres, Burstyn has garnered rave reviews for his portrayal of Al Jolson on Broadway. Helfgot is the Pavarotti of the cantorial world, with a voice to rival that of any world-class opera singer and Spiro is a world-renowned cantor who's also made his mark in the pop world, singing with Elton John, Shania Twain and Phil Collins.

Accompanying the singers will be the 50-piece Sing-for-the-Children Symphony Orchestra, which includes members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and other local ensembles. Australian Russell Ger, an internationally renowned conductor from New York City who works closely with Helfgot, leads the orchestra.

Israel (Yummy) Schachter launched the Roy Thomson Hall concerts in support of Chai Lifeline nine years ago, after the organization, new to Canada at the time, asked him to help with its fundraising events. Over the years, the concerts have featured popular Jewish performers, including Marvin Hamlisch, Itzhak Perlman, Neil Sedaka and Art Garfunkel.

One problem, though, is that they were running out of big-name Jewish stars who could sell out a hall. So Schachter started looking around for a new concept for the annual event. When Schachter watched the 2014 show The Kids From Brooklyn, which featured the music of 1960s Jewish singers and a narrative written by Aliza Spiro, the founder of Toronto's Jewish Music Week, Schachter saw a new direction for the Chai Lifeline concerts.

He collaborated with Spiro, who's married to Cantor Spiro, and she ended up penning a narrative for British, Yiddish & Kiddush. Cantor Spiro said the audience will be exposed "not just to the cantorial side of things, not just the classical style of singing, not just the operatic style of singing, not just Broadway, but to all genres. It's for everybody."

He added that his wife has written a "beautiful narrative that weaves all the different genres of music together at different times during the show. So everyone is going to be taken on this beautiful, fun musical journey."

Chai Lifeline helps children who are suffering with serious illnesses and their families and also helps children with a seriously ill parent. Although many of Chai Lifeline's services are geared to the Jewish community, the organization "helps everybody who reaches out," Schachter said.

Although about 250 Chai Lifeline volunteers are currently assisting some 400 families, the organization has a low profile in the community as families with sick children tend to guard their privacy.

"Unless you actually know that child or that family, you'll never really know how much Chai Lifeline is doing behind the scenes to hold that family together," he said.

While Chai Lifeline does promote its services, "you don't really get a good sense of what they do," he added. He said people who attend the annual show get a better sense of what Chai Lifeline does through the videos it shows and through speakers who deliver first-person accounts.

"Families begin to crumble and fall apart as soon as they have a child who's been diagnosed with something. They simply don't know how to handle it," Schachter said. "The marriage starts to fall apart, their income is at risk. I've seen Chai Lifeline save hundreds of families over the years." ■

British, Yiddish and Kiddush is presented April 11 at 7:30 p.m at Roy Thomson Hall. For tickets, visit www.chaiconcert.com.

Play looks at effects of 9/11 on Jewish/Muslim couples

Michael Rubenfeld, second from left, stars in Disgraced at Panasonic Theatre in Toronto

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Playwright Ayad Akhtar focused on both the harmony and conflict between Jews and Muslims following the events of 9/11 in his drama Disgraced.

The one act play, which won the 2013 Pulitzer Prize for drama, is primarily about two married couples intertwined in personal and professional relationships. It opened April 3 at the Panasonic Theatre in Toronto.

Set in a Manhattan apartment in 2012, Amir (played by Raoul Bhaneja) is a Pakistani Muslim attorney, but has rejected Islam as his religion and his roots, preferring to think of himself primarily as an American. Amir works in a prestigious Manhattan law firm owned by Jews and hopes to become a partner in the firm.

Amir's wife Emily (Birgitte Solem) is an artist who loves putting Islamic tradition in her paintings much to the dismay of Amir. Adding to the mix and conflict is Jewish art dealer Isaac (Michael Rubenfeld), who, like Amir, views himself primarily as an American. Isaac is married to Jory (Karen Glave), a black American who is an attorney with Amir at the same firm. Emily sells her paintings to Isaac, who values Emily's work.

The couples get together for dinner with polite banter, despite disagreements between the two men. Isaac sees the beauty of Islamic tradition in art and Amir sees nothing memorable with his wife's focus on Islamic culture. Amir and Isaac also discuss similarities between principles in the Talmud and the Qu'ran and the two couples appear to be the best of friends.

However, the polite banter of the dinner party and harmony of the two couples changes within a short period of time. Amir is asked by his nephew Abe (Ali Momen) to represent an imam, who Abe thinks has been unfairly arrested for mistakenly helping terrorists. Amir wants nothing to do with the incident, but finally gives in to his nephew's pleas and visits the imam.

Because of the visit, Amir is mistakenly perceived by the Jews who run the law firm as a supporter of terrorism, starting a chain of events that lead to conflict between the two couples.

The events include secrets about the relationship of Emily and Isaac as well as tension between Amir and Jory on who will become a partner in the law form.

When Amir gives in to tense emotions by stating "I take some pride in what happened at 9/11", Isaac and the others are shocked.

Isaac, rebuffed by Amir's 9/11 comments, confronts Amir with comments on his pride for being a Jew and supporter of Israel.

An added twist in the plot has the two couples exploding in rage as the audience is engaged in the transformation of the characters. Amir reveals a dark side of his personality in affirming his Muslim heritage.

Both Bhaneja and Rubenfeld (who is Jewish) were superb in their roles as the enlightened Muslim and Jew respectively who both fall victim to pent up anger and frustration.

Disgraced does not have smooth messages of toleration, but illustrates that Jews and Muslims have much in common, despite ideological differences.

"The play is fascinating and goes deep into understanding relationships," said Rubenfeld.

"You have a black character who sides with a self-loathing Muslim and a Jewish character I play who is pro-Islam. It is a unique perspective from the playwright."

Disgraced was written in 2012 and premiered in Chicago and also played off-Broadway and regionally in Miami and other cities prior to coming to Toronto for Mirvish Productions.. The play won both the 2013 Pulitzer Prize for drama as well as the 2013 Obie Award for playwriting.

Born in Winnipeg, Rubenfeld is an actor, director and playwright dominated for 10 Dora Awards for many of his works, such as his plays Essay and My Fellow Creatures.

Residing in Toronto, he has been artistic director of the Summerworks Festival since 2008, presiding over 300 productions.

Since last year, Rubenfeld has been married to Magda Koralewska, a Polish Jew. The couple spends time both in Toronto and Poland where Magda still lives.

"We do commute as often as possible to see each other. There is such a strong bond between us and a love for Polish Jewry, that is vibrant," said Rubenfeld.

Rubenfeld's maternal and paternal grandparents are Holocaust survivors from Poland.

He has immersed himself into understanding his family's roots in Poland, creating a documentary about his Polish Jewish roots for which he and creative partner Sarah Garton Stanley received a Canadian Council grant.

"I am very proud of all I have done artistically in my life, including playing Isaac in Disgraced'."■

Disgraced runs until April 17 at the Panasonic Theatre, 651, Yonge St. Toronto. Call 416-872-1212 or go to www.mirvish.com.

Brundibar will be performed in Windsor

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Windsor's Jewish community has teamed up with a local musical group to retell a charming yet poignant children's Holocaust story that they will be taking to this year's world famous Edinburgh Fringe Festival.

Brundibar, A Children's Opera by Hans Krása, tells the story of Aniqa and Pepicek, brother and sister, who need to buy milk for their mother who is sick. But when they venture into the marketplace, their efforts at busking are thwarted by an organ grinder, Brundibar (Czech for bumblebee).

But soon other children, aided by animals such as a dog, cat and sparrow, come to the siblings' rescue and help them defeat the mean organ grinder.

The opera was first performed in a Jewish orphanage in occupied Prague during World War II. It was reprised many times at the Theresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia, where the composer, the original cast of children, and the set designer, all found themselves as prisoners. Theresienstadt was the model camp where the Nazis brought Red Cross inspectors to show how well they treated the inmates.

But after a final performance before those

Brundibar was first performed at Theresienstadt, the Nazi "model camp."

Red Cross officials, the entire cast was shipped to Auschwitz, where they died.

The Windsor performances are expected to appeal to children and adults alike.

For children, Brundibar is a "unique and interesting way" to address the Holocaust, and "which is not a depressing production by any means," says director Tracey Atin, a cantor at the city's Congregation Beth El and founder of Windsor's popular Korda Artistic Productions theatre company.

"It's really lighthearted and charming and happy – the opera itself – and very accessible," she said. "It's just an interesting gateway into the study of the Holocaust."

The play also addresses contemporary issues like bullying. Aniqa and Pepicek, for example, end up getting help from others and "suddenly they're a force to be reckoned with and they have a way of dealing with the bully," Atin said.

The children in the production are between six to 14 years old and come from a group called Music Moves Kids (MMK), an area arts company that teaches singing and has a children's choir.

Brundibar will be performed 10 times for school children – Jewish and non-Jewish alike – who will be bussed in from throughout the greater Windsor area.

There will be one public performance April 7 at 7.30 p.m. All performances are at the Windsor Jewish Community Centre.

Both Atin and MMK music director Erin Armstrong are sopranos. During the public performance they will be singing additional works from I Never Saw Another Butterfly with clarinetist and University of Windsor Music School director Trevor Pittman, and some Hebrew, Yiddish and Ladino arias.

A soprano duet of Leo Delibes' famous Flower Duet from Lakmé, will also be performed by Armstrong and gifted young soprano Will Trigo Ebere.

The production is coupled with a museum exhibit also at the community centre that focuses on the Kinder Transport program which saw thousands of European Jewish children transported to safety in Great Britain for the duration of the war.

Exhibit pieces come from the Holocaust Memorial Centre in West Bloomfield, Mich. and from the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, DC. ■

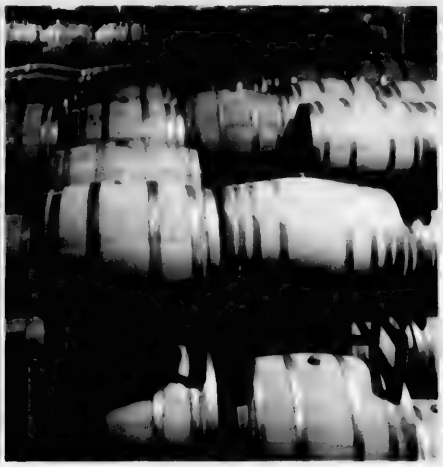
Oxnard: California's kosher wine secret



Herzog Wine Cellars sits in a nondescript industrial facility just off the highway. MICHAEL STAVSKY PHOTOS

MICHAEL STAVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The sleepy seaside town of Oxnard, Calif., sits away from the hustle and bustle of Los Angeles. Although only about an hour and a half north in Ventura County, the town has the quaint charm of a Mediterranean village.

Free from the congestion and pollution of its southern neighbour, Oxnard's rocky picturesque coastline sits dotted with endless yachts and pleasure boats. Many serve the nearby Channel Islands off the coast.

This bastion of tranquility is also far removed from L.A.'s half-million strong Jewish community. With neighbourhood after neighbourhood lined with synagogues of all denominations and kosher eateries that put Toronto's measly few to shame, one would expect a major Kosher wine producer to set up shop closer to the heart of it all.

But Oxnard's proximity to the megalopolis of Los Angeles is secondary to its location closer to several of California's major grape growing regions. And avoiding the near-permanent traffic jam of Los Angeles allows grapes from all over the state to reach Oxnard in a timely manner.

It's here, away from vibrant Jewish communities, that Royal Wine Corporation, makers of Kedem grape juice and wines, established Herzog Wine Cellars some 30 years ago. Their current state-of-the-art facility opened in 2005.

Now the largest kosher wine facility in North America, the Baron Herzog line of fine wines rivals their non-kosher counterparts. Gone are the days of the stereotypical sweet table wines gracing the tables in kosher homes. Having won numerous wine competitions and tasting awards over the years, Herzog wines are sought after by Jews and non-Jews alike.

Herzog Wine Cellars sits in a nondescript industrial facility just off the highway. With the serene setting and fabulous climate, we were sure their grapes come from a nearby vineyard. But after seeing the immense production facility inside, we learned that Herzog's California wines are produced from grapes grown in world famous regions like Napa Valley, Sonoma and Mendocino counties, as well as smaller areas like the nearby Santa Ynez valley.

Each region grows grapes that are unique to their area and have been cultivated to produce some incredible varietals. And Herzog's master winemakers carefully select grapes that produce some fabulous wine blends.

Due to the laws of kashrut, from the time the grapes are crushed, only religious Jews are allowed to be involved in the wine making process. Herzog Wine Cellars are no different. Far from any large established Jewish communities, a team of Orthodox winemakers, machinists, staff and mashgichim (kosher supervisors) work together to produce wine shipped all over the world. One staff member mentioned the warehouse in back where nearly $3 million of wine is stored.

On the day of our visit, the facility was in the process of bottling Baron Herzog Jeunesse. From our vantage point in the viewing area above the plant, we could clearly read the signs stating that only mashgichim were allowed within the bottling loop during production.

At 2p.m., production halted. With so many Orthodox workers in the facility, it was time to daven Minchah. In a small, makeshift synagogue at the corner of the immense fermentation tank room, I joined the men in prayer forming a minyan.

Next it was off to the bar where all of Baron Herzog's wines are available for purchase. The wine-tasting option, however, is a must. For a small fee, patrons are served 10 different Baron Herzog wines ranging from exquisitely dry reds like Zinfandel to sublime late-harvest Chenin Blanc.

The newest Herzog blend, called Camouflage and released in 2015, uses 12 different varieties of grapes and was produced to commemorate Herzog's 30 years of California wine-making. With subtle hints of raspberry and chocolate, it was the wine I decided to take home with me. And any bottle purchased from the wine bar waives the fee for the wine tasting.

When the new facility opened in 2005, the Herzog family decided that visitors to the facility should complement their visit and wine tasting with a fine meal as well. It was with this in mind that Tierra Sur was established.

The only Zagat rated restaurant within 65 kilometres, the glatt kosher Tierra Sur appeals to Jews and non-Jews alike. With tasteful décor and available terraced dining, the restaurant sources many of its ingredients from local Oxnard farmers. Open for lunch and dinner, the restaurant serves elegant American fare with wine pairings available for each course. Rivaling any kosher fine dining establishment in Los Angeles, Tierra Sur is a kosher foodie's dream and makes for an elegant nightcap to a visit to Herzog Wine Cellars. ■

Brooklyn: a movie that resonates

Dr. Michael Gordon

Occasionally, one reads an article that resonates at many levels with the reader. A few days after having seen the movie Brooklyn, based on the book by Irish writer Colm Toibin, there was an article in the New York Times in which he and author Alice Walker were interviewed. The part of the interview that resonated with me mirrored the film, which touched me in many ways, as it took place during my preteen years in Brooklyn.

That the story revolves around an immigrant from Ireland who settles in Brooklyn had, from the start, themes familiar to me, having been influenced greatly by my Lithuanian-born grandmother with whom I shared a bedroom along with my sister, during these same preteen 1950s years.

Without my realizing it, her life experiences and her penchant for telling stories about her immigrant and early working years in Brooklyn profoundly affected and perhaps laid the groundwork for my final professional decisions to focus on geriatrics and eldercare. When people ask me why I gravitated to that medical specialty, besides the unpredictable factors of opportunity and chance and good fortune, I often respond that the great joy in eldercare, beyond the usual satisfactions of doing meaningful medical work, is that all of my patients come with stories. These stories often rivet and connect me to the patients and become part of my own meaningful collective medical and life narrative.

The film Brooklyn resonated because it was not just an immigrant story, but it took place in the Brooklyn that I recall so fondly – the Brooklyn of the Dodgers, from just prior to their being at the bottom of the "Wait until next year" story, to the 1955 World Series Championship, to that terrible year in 1957 when it was announced that our beloved Dodgers, with their home in the tired but always welcoming Ebbets Field, would be moving to Los Angeles, which they did in 1958. For many, it portended the end to their love of and engagement in the world of baseball.

> Brooklyn resonated because it was not just an immigrant story, but it took place in the Brooklyn that I recall so fondly.

The movie has scenes of Coney Island, a few kilometres up the beach and boardwalk from my home in Brighton Beach, and Brooklyn College, where the heroine goes to study at night school, and was my alma mater. It reminded me of the common need for immigrants or the first generation of Americans to study at night while they worked to support their studies and help with their families during the day – my father took more than 10 years to complete his engineering degree at Cooper Union, another of the marvellous and accessible universities in New York – and followed this with a lifelong career as a civilian working for the U.S. Department of Defence.

In the New York Times interview, Toibin says, "I had to be careful not to preach… in the book, just tell the story. But I hope that when you see the young Lithuanian girl at the cash register in the supermarket looking really sad one day, you know it's for good reason: she's missing home. I hoped the book might contribute to that public debate."

It was that quote, which, as they say, closed the circle of the movie for me: my experience of growing up in Brooklyn and the immigrant experience I heard stories about from my Lithuanian-born grandmother – she was not at a cash register but at a sewing machine, initially in a factory, and, over the years, she became an active Lady Garment Workers member and organizer (ILGWU), a socialist influence that was not lost on me during my early years.

For a lovely and moving film experience, Brooklyn is a jewel – I have not read the book, but am sure it is equally as moving, and as is usually the case, although the story may be the same, its presentation and development and language would likely add another important dimension to this universal and individual immigrant experience. ■

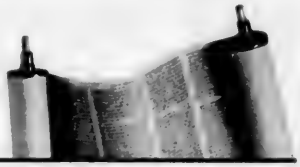
Tazria | Leviticus 12:1-13:59



Yacov Fruchter says spiritual leadership means giving people the space to grow on their own
Rabbi Shalom Spira discusses practical applications of the mitzvah of saving a life
Rachael Turkienicz elaborates on the link between leprosy and gossip

Yacov Fruchter

One reason I joined the Beth Tzedec Congregation team in Toronto last summer was because of my interest in spiritual care, and my desire to adopt Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl as a mentor in this field. Rabbi Frydman-Kohl has a significant reputation for his focus on chesed work and walking alongside and supporting people through their most challenging and spiritually confusing times.

A few months ago, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl invited me to shadow him as he helped a family "get up" from shivah after the passing of the family patriarch. The rabbi had a close relationship with the family and was aware that the deceased had left several of his family members in tremendous pain.

For this family, the shivah was an opportunity for mourning their loss and the beginning of healing from emotional wounds. It was also an opportunity for them to strengthen the damaged bonds between the remaining relatives before continuing with their normal activities. In helping the family cross the threshold into a new normal, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl spent over an hour with them preparing for the weeks to come, and created the space for them to reflect on their experiences during the shivah, as well as their emotional states.

I was reminded of the passages we read this week. In Tazria, people also find themselves isolated and withdrawn from normal communal activities after becoming ritually impure, following either the birth of a child, or the identification of the ailment known as tzara'at. In both cases, they cannot fully rejoin communal life until the kohen confirms that they are ready and, through ritual practice, invites them back in.

In 2016, many Jews feel they have been pushed away from traditional Jewish spaces and made to feel unfit. We need spiritual leadership who are welcoming, forward thinking and sensitive enough to allow individuals the space to grow on their own and within an inviting community. ■

Yacov Fruchter is director of community building and spiritual engagement at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"On the eighth day, the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised" (Leviticus, 12:3). The Gemara, Yoma, 34b, derives from the term besar (the flesh of) that even if the baby is afflicted with tzara'at (a skin disorder, often translated as leprosy), circumcision overrides the prohibition (Deuteronomy, 24:8) against a dermatologist removing tzara'at. This special biblical licence is specifically required for Rabbi Yehudah, who generally forbids unintended side effects.

The Gemara objects that the same Rabbi Yehudah allows placing hot iron spits in the near-freezing Temple mikvah on Yom Kippur. A second effect of submerging glowing iron into cold water is that the metal will become tempered (one of the 39 labours proscribed on Yom Kippur). How, then, can he countenance mikvah warming?

The commentaries clash on the Gemara's answer. According to Rashi, the metallurgical tempering is only sub-optimal in nature because the raw iron spits do not serve as a useful receptacle. Under such circumstances, tempering (if performed deliberately) would merely represent a rabbinic infraction like all sub-optimal labours performed on Yom Kippur, and double effects do not apply to rabbinic interdictions.

Tosafot, on the other hand, distinguish the Sabbath/Yom Kippur from all other mitzvot, because the Sabbath laws are derived from the Tabernacle architecture, which specifies "goal-oriented labour" (Exodus, 35:33). Since a double effect is not goal-oriented, it is merely rabbinically forbidden on the Sabbath. And to facilitate the sacrificial service, the sages granted the Temple immunity from inconvenient rabbinic Sabbath legislation.

Based on the above analysis, Rabbi J. David Bleich (in the journal Tradition) prohibits administration of morphine to a terminally ill patient in such a manner that the latter's death will result as a second effect. Neither Rashi's nor Tosafot's leniency is applicable to the mitzvah of saving a life, and the morphine dose should be carefully titrated against the patient's symptoms. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

This week's parshah speaks of ritual impurity pertaining to a woman who has given birth, and then the impurities of leprosy. It speaks of sacrifices and time restrictions.

But beyond the ancient Jewish rites of purity and impurity lies a subtle and powerful message within the structure of the parshah. First, we must remember how the Torah and the sages understand leprosy. It is a highly contagious, infectious and deadly disease. The sages teach us that leprosy is linked to the sin of gossip, or "lashon hara." Miriam, Moses' sister, is struck with leprosy when she gossips about Moses in the desert.

The properties of leprosy also describe the properties of gossip. They are both infectious, both contagious, and both destroy someone's life piece by piece and eat away at the individual from the outside in.

In fact, the description in the parshah can also be paralleled with the different degrees of gossip. Some are surface comments that can be brushed off, others are insidious and damaging. While exploring the topic, we return to the parshah, which gives us a structure that reflects true life.

The Torah portion begins by discussing a woman who has given birth. Immediately following these details, the Torah proceeds to discuss the signs of leprosy, the symbolic disease of gossip. We can now see the warning presented to us.

Amidst the community celebrating the addition of a new member, there is the very real temptation to discuss the woman and the circumstances of the birth. The delivery of a baby is both the most public and the most private of moments. The structure of the parshah reminds us to always guard our words and remember that we share each other's lives and protect each other's sacred moments. ■

Rabbi Sacks: Extremism is hitting all the world faiths

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth from 1991 to 2013, is a global religious leader and philosopher. Author of more than 25 books, Rabbi Sacks has published commentaries on the Jewish daily prayer book and holiday machzorim. His 2015 book, Not in God's Name: Confronting Religious Violence, addresses religious extremism and violence committed in the name of God.

Rabbi Sacks spoke in Toronto at Glenn Gould Studio on March 15 and at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue March 16.

What spurred you to write Not in God's Name?

I began writing it a very long time ago. I published a book on the first anniversary of 9/11 called Dignity of Difference, and at that time, I wanted to explore more deeply the tensions that lead people toward religiously motivated violence. So in 2002, I began Not in God's Name. It turned out to be very difficult, and I put it aside three years later. Then, in the summer of 2014, there was all of the ISIS-related violence and I decided to bring the manuscript back out. I felt there was this new chapter in the horrific story of religiously motivated violence in the 21st century, and it seemed so important that I felt I had to write about it. I went back to the manuscript and rewrote the book completely.

Why do you believe that the 21st century has seen a surge of religious extremism and violence?

I think what's happening in the Middle East reflects a failure in many places of secular, nationalist politics. In Syria, Iraq, Egypt, even in Turkey, we see the failure of secular nationalism. It failed because the regimes in these places were corrupt, essentially, and in many cases, sustained by rather brutal dictators. It takes a long time to create a culture of freedom, and I don't think leaders like Hafez Assad, Moammar Gadhafi or Saddam Hussein tried, because they wanted to maintain a grip on power. In the end, you can't sustain this. Now, we're seeing a really toxic mix of religion and politics in the region. The language is religious, but the objectives are all political.

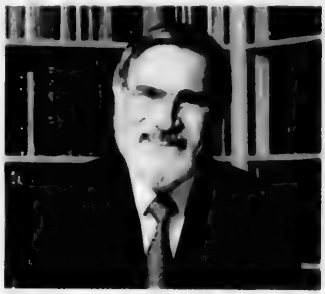
How do the tensions between the three Abrahamic faiths – Judaism, Islam and Christianity – contribute to violence and political unrest?

In Not in God's Name, I argue that the three Abrahamic faiths all have sibling rivalries written into the stories each religion tells about itself. And the relationship between the faiths is similar, say, to the relationship between Jacob and Esau or Isaac and Ishmael or, at worst, Cain and Abel. We're talking here about ancient theologies, but it's because we have to be honest enough to recognize that we've never really worked through our religious differences as faiths. We've never really delved into our relationships in the sacred texts.

To what extent do you see interfaith discussion as part of the solution to increased religious violence?

I think we may need something stronger than interfaith discussion, though we certainly do need it. Interfaith discussion is, "I tell you what I believe, and vice versa, and we're nice to each other." We need more than that: we need a side-by-side approach, which is, "I don't mind what you believe, and vice versa, and we realize that we face a problem that we can only solve by working together."

In the same vein, regarding the problem of religious violence, I don't think we necessarily need theological dialogue to address it, but all the faiths need to recognize that we can solve this problem if we all work together. This is more of a grassroots approach, whereas formal, interfaith dialogue tends to be very elite.



Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

Much of the current unrest in the Middle East (other than in Israel) stems from conflicts occurring within divisions of Islam, and not so much between Muslims, Jews and Christians. Can you speak to that?

True. But at the moment, Christians are also being ethnically cleansed from large parts of the Middle East. And there is profoundly anti-Israel rhetoric being disseminated on university campuses and throughout the world. Much of what I say in the book has nothing to do with Sunni and Shiite divisions – I think a non-Muslim is well-advised not to write about this subject. You can't deal with everything in one go. Thousands of books have dealt with looking at extreme forms of radical, political Islam since 9/11 happened. I wanted to try to say something new.

Do you think religious violence across the Abrahamic faiths tends to stem from misreadings of the Old and New Testaments and the Qur'an?

I argue that people who read these texts and practise violence are misreading them. I do argue for a new reading of these texts. But it's very easy to misread them, because there are violent passages in all of them: in the Hebrew Bible, the New Testament and the Qur'an. I think we all have dangerous texts. All of us do, including atheists.

What are examples of how these religious texts have been misunderstood?

The central part of the book is a new reading of all the stories of sibling rivalry in Genesis. I'm looking at Genesis because it features stories common to Jews, Christians and Muslims – all three speak about Abraham. So what I'm posing is, can we carefully read these stories in a new way? And most people who've read my book say, "I may not agree with everything you say, but yes, I can see there is a new way of reading these stories."

With regard to Judaism, to what extent and where are you seeing extremism occurring?

We've had a real problem with this at various points in Jewish history. In the book, I focus on situations in the first century when Jews inside the besieged Jerusalem were busier killing each other than the Romans outside of it. I focus on this moment in Jewish history just as I focus on the 17th century when I look at Christianity. I'm not looking at the contemporary Middle East. I'm stepping back and saying, "Let's look at the unexorcised ghosts in our religious texts." I think the book would be impossibly controversial if I tried to look at contemporary issues. I've tried to give it some historical distance.

You say that religion needn't be the root of violence, but part of the solution. How can this be brought about?

I seriously believe that a precedent was set by the Vatican II, in 1965, when it decried persecution against Jews. This redefined the Catholic Church's relation to Jews. Whereas for centuries, Jews and Catholics met with animus and a lack of understanding, today they meet as friends. So if one can make that change between Jews and Catholics, maybe similar changes can be made between Judaism and Islam, and Christianity and Islam. ■

Backstory

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Born in 1960 in Toronto, literary scholar Leon Litvack now lives in Belfast, Northern Ireland, but still fulfils the role of spiritual advisor and sometimes cantor for Beth Israel Congregation in Peterborough, Ont.

Decades ago, Litvack attained a bachelor's degree in English literature and religious studies from the University of Toronto, then started postgraduate studies – and a new life – in Britain. Today he is a professor of Victorian studies at Queen's University in Belfast and a noted specialist on the works of Charles Dickens.

Somewhat fittingly, it was a dramatic and somewhat Dickensian twist of fate that led him to establish a new connection with Canada via the Peterborough shul.

Adopted as an infant into a Jewish family in Toronto's Forest Hill neighbourhood, Litvack received a Jewish education at Associated Hebrew Schools and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and acquired his adoptive father's love of cantorial music. As a teenager, he often read the Torah and led services for the adult congregation at Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Then, several years ago, came a bolt from the blue in the form of a communication from a relative he didn't know he had, allowing him to discover his birth family, who were from Peterborough. "I never went looking for it," he said. "It came to me in an email from my half-sister who found me after they passed the Adoption Disclosure Act in 2009."

Litvack conducts High Holiday services for the Peterborough congregation, as well as infrequent Erev Shabbat services when he is in town. "I've introduced a meditative service for them on Friday nights – a 'kirtan' service, which combines eastern musical forms with Hebrew words in order to give it that kind of eastern feel that a lot of Jews respond to quite favourably," he said. He is also a halachic advisor for congregants.

A trustee of the Charles Dickens Museum in London, Litvack is primarily known in the scholarly world as the principle editor of the Charles Dickens Letters Project, an enterprise that seeks out newly discovered letters by Dickens that have never been in the public domain. He and his team of three get copies of the letters, transcribe them, provide context, and publish them in supplementary journals of a 12-volume series of letters that was completed in 2012.

> Litvack is primarily known in the scholarly world as the principle editor of the Charles Dickens Letters Project

"It's amazing how many letters are out there that have never seen the light of day. I would say that I personally find 30 or 40 letters a year. Generally, these are letters that are brought to auction houses like Christie's, Bonham's or Sotheby's and sold in their sales."

Dickens, of course, was a prolific writer, not just of novels and stories but of letters as well: the project has documented close to 15,000. That number doesn't include the many baskets of letters that the famed author – in the midst of an affair and ever mindful of his reputation – gathered back from his correspondents and destroyed in a bonfire in the 1860s.

"He was very careful about protecting his private life, and he worried about anything in the public domain that would cast him in a negative light," Litvack said.

Newly surfaced letters may come with a price tag of 5,000 British pounds or more, but Litvack and his team don't need to worry about raising that kind of money. "We have very good relations with the auction houses, so generally, if I'm not able to get a transcription from a low-resolution image on the website, I write them for a copy. They understand that we do not publish the images, we only want the text."

Litvack's related activities include the Dickens Festival that he and others staged in Belfast to mark the bicentenary of the author's birth in 2012. Currently, he's researching the backgrounds of photographs of Dickens and the photographers who created them. He's also slated to assemble an exhibition of portraits of the literary giant for the Charles Dickens Museum to mark the 150th anniversary of his death in 2020. ■

Israel gets support from Canada's north, and a literary giant dies in Hungary

Yukon premier condemns BDS

Few may have noticed at the time, but Yukon Premier Darrell Pasloski came out strongly against the boycotts, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel Feb. 23, the same day Canada's Parliament condemned BDS. "There is growing international recognition that the BDS movement is veiled anti-Semitism," Pasloski stated. "As Canadians, we must speak up strongly and clearly again discrimination in all its forms." The BDS motion was passed by the majority of Conservative and Liberal MPs. Pasloski's conservative Yukon Party has 12 seats in the 19-seat legislature. He's been premier since 2011.

Auschwitz survivor won Nobel Prize

Imre Kertesz, a Holocaust survivor who won the Nobel Prize for literature, died March 28 in Budapest at age 86. Kertesz, who portrayed the horrors of Auschwitz in some of his writings, reportedly suffered from Parkinson's disease. He was deported from his native Budapest to Auschwitz in 1944 at age 14, and was transferred the next year to Buchenwald, where he was liberated in 1945. Kertesz returned to Budapest after the war and worked as a journalist, but lost his job in 1951 when the newspaper adopted the Communist Party line. He later moved to Berlin, where he lived until recent years. In 2002, Kertesz became the first Hungarian to win the Nobel for literature.

Gay wedding a first in Argentina

A Buenos Aires shul will host the first official same-sex Jewish marriage held in a synagogue in Latin America. The shul, NCI-Emanu El, and the LGBTQ group Judios Argentinos Gay, announced April 6 that the assembly of NCI last month unanimously approved a request to hold a same-sex wedding, and that Romi Charur and Vicky Escobar will marry this month. No date was released. Both groups said it's the first official same-sex Jewish marriage to be held in a religious setting in Latin America. NCI-Emanu El belongs to both the Conservative and Reform movements. Argentina was the first Latin American nation to allow gay marriage, which has been legal since 2010. ■

Letters to the Editor

Protecting the vulnerable

Diane Richler asks where the Jewish community is in the debate on assisted suicide (Letters, March 31). The answer is that we are everywhere.

Unlike certain issues such as racism, where there is near unanimous agreement within the community, the issue of medical assistance in dying is past being a yes or no question. The court has ruled.

It is now a matter of working out details, such as who should be eligible, who should be permitted to take part, and how we can ensure access and protection for all, while protecting the rights of those who cannot take part in this process.

Many of those of us who are leading in this process are Jewish. However, because the issues are not unique to our community, we are not working in isolation, and so we just aren't as visible. However, our voices are being clearly heard.

Hershi Berman, MD

Putting God first

Rabbi Donniel Hartman in his new book Putting God Second: How to Save Religion from Itself ("Putting God first by putting God second," March 31) claims that a life of faith "very often activates a critical flaw that supports and encourages immoral impulses." One example he gives is that "it can exhaust one's ability to see the needs of other human beings." Hillel's Golden Rule, "to not do to your neighbour what is hateful to you," is brought as the panacea to Hartman's problem with putting God first.

With all due respect, Rashi, the foremost talmudic and biblical commentator, explains the story with Hillel differently. Rashi gives two explanations for Hillel's answer to the potential convert. The second explanation of Rashi is the well-known one quoted above. Rashi's first explanation, however, interprets "your neighbour" (literally your friend) as referring to God. Rashi says that one shouldn't transgress God's words just as you wouldn't want your neighbour to do something that is hateful to you.

Understood this way, both ritual and interpersonal commandments are given equal importance. Our sages say the Ten Commandments were given on two tablets to emphasize the equality between the ritual commandments on the first tablet and the interpersonal commandments on the second. Why then do the Ten Commandments begin with laws between man and God? The very first word of the Ten Commandments is "I" (Anochi) referring to God. The very last word is "to your neighbour" (lere'echa). God requires we accept Him, not because He needs us, but because our neighbour does. It is only a life of faith, putting God first, that engenders moral behaviour toward our neighbour in any and all situations.

Abraham said it best in his response to Avimelech, king of Gerar, who asked him why he didn't say that Sarah was his wife. Abraham answered: "There is but no fear of God in this place, and they would have killed me because of my wife" (Genesis 20:11). A nation can be highly advanced with superficial geniality and manners (i.e. Nazi Germany's gemütlichkeit) but without fear of God, anything is possible.

Rabbi Mordechai Bulus
Montreal

Leave shul service alone

Yoni Goldstein wrote about stemming the decline in synagogue membership, "Even with rabbis trying just about everything, nothing seems to be working," ("My three shuls," March 10).

In their efforts to stem the tide of disaffection, the first thing our leaders throw out from the synagogue is the service itself. It is no longer uncommon for rabbis themselves to tell us that prayers are boring. They replace them with mindfulness sessions and Carlebach singalongs, even though most people don't know the tunes. (And, yes, I have attended a Jewish mindfulness session – phones rang constantly, people rattled their water bottles, and the guy on the door, who was instructed to keep people out and prevent disturbance, kept letting latecomers in.)

So here's my suggestion: let's try just leaving the service alone. Sing the traditional tunes and use our time-tested nusach, led by a trained prayer leader. The synagogue will become what it has always been: a place for the community to share in a celebration of time and space, with the feeling, in Chaim Grade's words, that the clouds have been swept from the sky.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Speak up or stay silent?

Should Jews seek to influence societal values based on our teachings, or are we a minority seeking to preserve our freedom and be exempt from laws that infringe on our beliefs?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: When a congregant asks a formal she'eilah (question), I am happy to provide a rabbinic tshuvah (response). When however I am asked to weigh in on issues of public concern, especially if my voice is intended to be public, I am less at ease. When it comes to public policy, rabbis must not only be cautious with what they say, but be able to justify saying anything at all.

Of recent note is the conversation around physician assisted dying. Certainly, it is in the appropriate religious realm for rabbis to advise Jews as to the permissibility of Jewish patients or doctors partaking in this course of action. It is also, in my opinion, absolutely acceptable for rabbis to be at the forefront of voices calling for significant safeguards in order to protect society's most vulnerable.

However, in a situation of a non-Jewish terminally ill individual in chronic intolerable pain who has requested of his willing non-Jewish doctor to assist her in dying, one may reasonably ask why should there be a Jewish voice in deciding whether or not the physician may comply? How is physician assisted dying different than other issues, where we reject religious interference?

Rabbi Scheier: Your question is a profound one. It speaks to how we, as Jews, perceive our place in society: are we a guiding force of morality and ethics that seeks to influence societal values based on our teachings, or are we simply a minority seeking to preserve our freedom and therefore be exempt from legislation that infringes on our religious beliefs?

What is our community's threshold for when to speak up and when to remain silent? To this question, I'm not sure there's a concrete answer, as lobbying is often an art, not a science. Perhaps, in that physician assisted dying is literally a question of life and death, we have met our parameters for intervention. At the very least, we reaffirm the importance to voice values that we see as central to sustaining a moral society.

Where do you see the line drawn? Should we differentiate between religious advocacy on the issue of same-sex marriages and the issue of physician assisted dying?

Rabbi Cutler: While I am generally leery of slippery slope arguments, I believe that the likelihood of physician assisted dying leading to the cheapening of the value of human life is too great to merit its legalization. A world that sees human life as nothing but a biological fact is a world that too easily dismisses those who cannot materially contribute to the collective or who are regarded as too different or too much of a burden. It is in such a world that atrocities become more easily achieved.

For me, a critical factor in deciding whether it is appropriate to insert a Jewish voice into a public conversation is the potential result of silence. Would failure to speak result in lost lives? Would silence lead to the deaths of society's most vulnerable? If the answer is yes, then that is reason enough to speak out.

Rabbi Scheier: It seems that my line of demarcation might be less utilitarian than yours. For me, a dramatic and definite outcome – even if derived through the "slippery slope" – is not the only prerequisite for Jewish values being voiced in a secular-society debate. Rather, Jewish thought has something to contribute to society at large, regardless of the case's specific ramifications.

While I recoil at the idea of one religion's system of values determining policy for society at large, I do believe that values-based morality should inform both major and minor issues that any society faces. In Jewish law and the Torah, we have a foundation for moral society. It would be a shame to silence these values simply because they emerge from a religious tradition.

Perhaps at the end of the day, what motivates this conversation is the desire to live in a values-based society, in which our leaders make decisions based not on whim or opinion, but on a value system that is tried and true. For us, the Torah provides the backbone and structure to how we process life and its challenges. The struggle, perhaps, of living in a multicultural, secular society, is to construct policies that neither completely mimic nor fully reject the various traditional value systems present in that society. ■

Is this the end of the knife intifadah?

Is the so-called knife intifadah finally waning? The latest statistics from the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, indicate that after six deadly months, violence is on the decline, even if the situation remains precarious. According to the Shin Bet, there have been three major attacks on Israelis this month, a significant reduction from the 20 serious attacks it counted in March, 155 in February, 169 in January and 246 in December. There were 78 attacks in October 2015, when the current round of violence began.

Why are the attacks in such steep decline? In large measure, due to the efforts of the Israeli security establishment – on this point, the Shin Bet and the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appear to agree. But where the government and its security apparatus diverge is on the motivation behind these attacks.

Netanyahu contends that Palestinian government and media outlets are to blame for incitement. The Shin Bet believes the majority of Palestinian and Israeli-Arab attackers have been spurred to action by what it calls "personal issues," including "dire personal or financial" situations. Over the weekend, a Shin Bet official further argued that the arrest of the Jewish-Israelis allegedly behind the murderous arson attack in the West Bank village of Duma has contributed to the relative calm of late. (If that is indeed the case, then perhaps the upcoming trial of an Israeli soldier charged with manslaughter for shooting a Palestinian terrorist in Hebron might lead to a further drop in the number of attacks.)

The Netanyahu government and Shin Bet concur that Israelis have to remain vigilant in the fight against terror, or a reversal of these positive numbers may occur. Nobody is claiming victory over the knife intifadah just yet, and that's just as well. Because even when it does end, after all the bloodshed it's hard to see how anyone comes out looking like a winner.

The New Democratic Party is looking for a new leader, after its members voted on Sunday to replace Tom Mulcair.

Mulcair drew the ire of many in the Jewish community recently when he and the entire NDP parliamentary caucus voted against a motion rejecting the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel. (This after Mulcair had thoroughly rejected the BDS campaign during an interview with The CJN.) But if some have long suspected that the NDP harbours the animosity of the far left when it comes to Israel, it could be about to get much worse.

The NDP rank-and-file appear to be warming to the Leap Manifesto, which calls for a ban on new oil pipeline infrastructure in Canada and a dramatic move away from fossil fuels. And while that's worth debating, the problem is that some of the people behind it, including the activist and author Naomi Klein, are vocal supporters of BDS. (Klein's husband, Avi Lewis, has even been touted as a potential NDP leader.)

The Leap Manifesto doesn't mention Israel per se. But if the document does eventually form the basis of NDP policy, its backers could try to shoehorn BDS into the agenda. And if that happens, the Jewish community might very well be left longing for Mulcair's more centrist path. ■ — YONI

Driving Rabbi Sacks

Rabbi Eddie Shostak

On his recent whirlwind trip to Montreal, I was asked to drive Rabbi Jonathan Sacks to a speaking engagement. After taking a breath of exhilaration, I humbly accepted the opportunity to spend 25 minutes in a car with one of my greatest living heroes.

As I carefully converted our family minivan into a royal stagecoach, dismounting four car seats and eliminating remnant Cheerios, I contemplated what my objectives would be for this unique journey. I came up with the following:

First, get Rabbi Sacks, together with his wife and his attaché, to their destination on time and in one piece. Second, get a picture together with the rabbi as a personal memento. Third, have the rabbi inscribe one of my favourite of his books, Lessons in Leadership. And lastly, ask Rabbi Sacks one good question.

Morning arrived and I traveled downtown just after sunrise. I stood anxiously in the lobby of the hotel. The elevator doors opened, Rabbi Sacks greeting me warmly, and I escorted the group to the car. After some initial conversation about the coming day's events and Montreal's Jewish community, I asked my question: where can one make a greater impact on Jewish lives – in a day school or at a synagogue?

Rabbi Sacks paused before rejecting the simple binary offered: "Without question, one can make the most impact in day schools," he said. "Communities should have their primary focus on day schools, but in partnership with strong synagogues."

Then, the rabbi shared two anecdotes. The first was that in the mid-19th century, when Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch was invited to become rabbi of a community in Germany, he was asked to build a new synagogue. He refused and declared: "First I will build a school, then I will build the shul." And so he did, building the famed Realschule in Frankfurt.

The second observation was more personal. In 1983, Rabbi Sacks was to be appointed rabbi of the prestigious West Marble Arch Synagogue in London, but he was told that he would have to give up teaching at Jews' College, the oldest rabbinical school in the world. Not wanting to leave teaching behind, he sought out his rabbi, who said matter-of-factly: "And why can't you do both?"

And so it was. Rabbi Sacks assumed the post of senior rabbi and became principal of Jews' College in 1984.

The lesson: if our shuls are going to be successful, our schools need to be successful. And if our schools are going to be successful, our shuls need to be successful. Not independently, but in partnership.

Rabbi Sacks' advocacy for partnership stimulated three ideas for strengthening the relationship between schools and synagogues to secure a more engaged, active and enthusiastic next generation of Jews.

Parents as teachers: In his evening talk in Montreal, Rabbi Sacks quoted the great kabbalist Rabbi Moshe Alshich, who asked, "How do we act in order to succeed in educating our children?" and answered, "It is what you love that your children will learn to love." Rabbi Sacks added: "It is the way your life reflects your loves, those are the things that our children will absorb and eventually make their own." When we as parents reflect our love for Jewish life and practice, our children will choose to commit to become engaged and enthusiastic Jews.

Meaningful interaction between the leadership of schools and synagogues: Synagogue leaders need to know what is going on in their members' schools, and school leaders need to know what is going on in their students' synagogues. What if synagogue professionals and lay leaders went on official school tours of their members' schools, observing them through a "synagogue lens"? This could be one way to gain knowledge on what they need to produce in order to close the "shul-school partnership" gap.

Day schools and communal responsibility: In 2011, a day school parent and former synagogue board chair in Hollywood, Fla., convinced his synagogue to allocate $30,000 (which was immediately matched by a donor) to day schools. Each school would receive an annual per capita distribution based on the number of students enrolled who were also members of his synagogue. I know of other communities that have duplicated this type of financial investment. It is truly an expression of "putting your money where your mouth is," especially since study after study shows that Jewish engagement is dependent more than ever on day school education.

In his closing remarks to an audience of over 1,300 in Montreal, Rabbi Sacks shared a story about his father, an immigrant to Britain who had to leave school at a young age in order to help support his family. Rabbi Sacks recalled walks home with his father from synagogue as a child. He would ask his father questions about Judaism. His father would offer the same answer every time: "I never had a Jewish education, so I cannot answer your questions. But, one day you will have the education that I never had and when that will happen, you will teach me the answers to those questions."

My 25-minute ride with Rabbi Sacks was a dream come true. His words have inspired me to engage in this dialogue with the larger community. And, by the way, I got the rabbi to his speaking engagement on time and unharmed, plus a treasured picture with him and that inscription for my friend. And while I think I asked a pretty good question, I know that I got an even better answer. ■

Building bridges between Jews and Muslims

Canadians of both faiths are working to foster mutual understanding, even if that means not talking about Israelis and Palestinians

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

On a wintry Tuesday night in Toronto, a group of women are engrossed in talk about mourning rites.

Tucked in a room at the University of Toronto's Multi-Faith Centre, they listen to a recording of a woman formerly part of Calgary's chevra kadisha (Jewish burial society) describe the customary Jewish procedure for preparing a body for burial.

Next, Hayat Mabrouk comes to the front of the room and uses a doll to demonstrate the method used in the Muslim tradition to clean and shroud a body.

The several dozen or so women assembled are students of a seven-week, Jewish-Muslim women's text study course called "Blood, Milk and Tears: Menstruating, Nursing and Mourning in Islamic and Jewish Sources."

After the presentations, they remark on the similarities between the two religions' burial customs, particularly the shared reverence for the deceased.

The course, comprising both Jewish and Muslim women ranging in age from their 20s to their 60s, was created and taught by Shari Goldberg, an academic who's been leading Jewish-Muslim text study groups since 2003.

Before that, she was involved in Jewish-Palestinian dialogue of a political nature, but found religiosity to be conspicuously missing from these conversations.

She grew frustrated, she said, with how the talks "often degenerated into screaming matches."

Shifting to Jewish-Muslim dialogue that uses "classical religious texts as a springboard" has been a way to "start from a place of common ground, not one of conflict," Goldberg explained.

While strife between Israelis and Palestinians has put enormous strain on Jewish-Muslim relations globally, there are Canadians from both faiths who are quietly and persistently working to foster mutual understanding between the two communities.

Among those at the forefront of these efforts, a consensus appears to have emerged on how to best build bridges between Canadian Jews and Muslims. They maintain that friendship and trust must first be established at a grassroots, person-to-person level, and that without it, the prospect of broaching contentious issues like Israeli-Palestinian relations is a non-starter.

Students of Shari Goldberg's Jewish-Muslim women's interfaith text study course explored issues of gender and embodiment in Jewish and Islamic texts SHARI GOLDBERG PHOTO

One group leading the charge is the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM), established in 1996 with an objective to promote good relations between the two communities in Canada.

Barbara Landau, who co-chairs the organization with Shahid Akhtar, said the CAJM has been meeting with a renewed sense of purpose since 9/11, seeking to counter the inevitable rise of Islamaphobia by creating a strong model for Jewish-Muslim co-operation.

Landau and Akhtar composed a joint statement calling for peace that was read at a Toronto City Hall rally, and by Rabbi Debra Landsberg to her congregation at Toronto's Temple Emanu-El.

The statement stressed that "Muslims are about to face what Jews have faced for decades, if not centuries," Landau said.

CAJM also began convening Jewish and Muslim leaders and community members for regular dialogue programs, shared celebrations for holidays such as Eid al-Fitr, Chanukah and Passover, and, in Toronto and Montreal, an annual Weekend of Twinning, part of an international initiative led by the New York-based Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, which co-ordinates partnerships between local synagogues and mosques.

If Canadian Jews and Muslims get to know each other on a personal basis and come to more deeply understand the values of the other, people from both communities will actually care about what happens to one another, Landau stressed.

"It's so much easier to make friends than enemies when you're looking at the humanity of the other," she said.

CAJM doesn't typically address the subject of Israel, Landau said, but she noted it's "definitely the elephant in the room for Jewish-Muslim relations."

"Nobody's asking us to solve the Middle East," she said, "though, if given the chance, we probably could do so more effectively [than those holding power in the region] right now, because we actually care about what happens to each other's families... We've built the feeling we're in a community together... We all care about the loss of lives and vulnerable people. That's our common ground."

Human rights consultant and CAJM member Karen Mock, a co-founder of the left-leaning Zionist group JSpace Canada, said the key to the CAJM's effectiveness is the fact it operates on a grassroots level.

"The leadership never wanted it to be a formal political organization. It's about people meeting with people," she stressed.

Leave an empty seder chair for a Jew murdered by terrorists

Gil Troy

Sadly, I am updating something I wrote in 2003, when Palestinians terrorists were targeting Israelis – as they are today.

Once again, during this year's seders, we will celebrate our joyous holiday of liberation with heavy hearts. Even as we revel in our freedom as Jews in the modern world, our brothers and sisters in Israel are in pain. This year, in particular, we must rise to the challenge to reclaim our symbols, remember our losses and reaffirm our commitment to Israel, the Jewish People and a true peace.

Since last October, when the Palestinians turned toward violence yet again, too many have died and too many have been injured, on both sides. And too many seders will have empty chairs, missing husbands, fathers, brothers, sons, wives, mothers, sisters and daughters.

The seder's power comes from its ritualization of memory. It is a primal, sensual, literal, service. The seder plate – evoking the mortar used in building with charoset and the tears shed by the slaves with salt water – helps us visualize the trauma of slavery.

The physical acts of reclining, of eating special foods, of standing to greet Elijah the prophet, help us feel the joy of Yetziat Mitzrayim, of leaving Egypt. And, in an affirmation of the importance of peoplehood, we mark this special moment not as individuals, but as a community.

In that spirit, we cannot proceed with business as usual during these difficult times. We must improvise a new ritual that marks our present pain, that illustrates our vital connection with Israel and with Israelis today. Let each of us, as we gather at our seders, intrude on our own celebrations by leaving one setting untouched, by having one empty chair at our table.

Let us take a moment to reflect on our losses. And as we do that, let us take the time to find out the name of one victim of the current conflict, or one victim murdered years earlier – one Jew who cannot celebrate this year's holiday, one family in mourning.

Let us call out the name of Koby Mandell, age 13, a young American immigrant brutally killed in May 2001, whose father, Rabbi Seth Mandell, talks about the empty seat at his Shabbat table and shares the pain of watching other boys grow up, watching their voices deepen, their shoulders broaden, their gaits quicken, even as his son lies dead. Let us call out the name of Hadar Goldin, a 23-year-old soldier killed by Hamas in August 2014, but whose remains Hamas is holding in a cruel assault on Hadar's family – and civilized norms.

Let us call out the names of Rabbi Eitam and Naama Henkin, ambushed in October, slaughtered in the front seat of their car as their four children sat in the back. Let us call out the name of Ezra Schwartz, an 18-year-old kid from Massachusetts who was just trying to enjoy his yeshiva gap year and help out with tzedakah projects when he was gunned down at a traffic stop. Let us call out the name of Dafna Meir, a 38-year-old mother of six who was stabbed to death while painting the front door to her home, who died protecting her children as they remained safely inside.

As we call these names, let us commit to some action, to embrace the victims' families. Let us build a friendship with Israel and Israelis that's not just about politics and not solely about mourning.

And as we call out these names, unlike our enemies, let us not call for vengeance. Instead, as we mourn, let us hope. As we remember the many lives lost during this crazy and pointless century of war, let us pray ever more intensely for a just and lasting peace, and for an end to the terrorism afflicting Jews and non-Jews alike. ■

Remembering a mentor

Sara Horowitz

Young as he was when he found refuge from the genocidal net tightening over the Jews of Europe, Prof. Geoffrey Hartman reflected in his memoir: "The shadow of the Holocaust often waylays me like the sudden darkness of a storm in the middle of a sunny day." Despite that shadow – or perhaps because of it – Hartman brought light to many students and readers until he succumbed to cancer a month ago.

He was a master teacher. As complex and challenging as much of his scholarly writing was, he had the gift of inspiring students. He could open up a poem to a roomful of people who did not know they liked poetry. He could make a memoir speak in new ways, reading between the lines and reading silences. He could walk you through difficult and complicated ideas and make them understandable without simplifying. Even more important, he would make people understand why ideas mattered.

Hartman was never my teacher in a formal, classroom way. He was a professor of literature at Yale University, and I did graduate work at Columbia and Brandeis. But he taught me things about reading, writing and thinking – and about commitment, truth and ethics – that have deeply imprinted my work.

When I was a graduate student, he was already a super-star academic. If you are not part of the university world, that very phrase might seem like a contradiction in terms. But he was part of a small number of professors whose innovative and powerful intellect shaped a generation of professors, graduate students and thinkers, and whose name was on everyone's lips and in everyone's footnotes.

His work emerged at the intersection of literary criticism and philosophy. When he gave a lecture at my university, there was a buzz in the air. Already then, he had a bushy white beard, looking every bit the éminence grise, although he was still in his 50s. I met him briefly, part of a crush of graduate students at his talk. But it wasn't until a few years later, when our orbits again crossed, that he took me under his wing.

By that time, he was also serving as the first director of the Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies at Yale, the first major project to collect videotaped recollections from Holocaust survivors and other eye-witnesses. At the age of nine, he had been among the many German children rescued from the Nazis by the Kindertransport. After the war, he ended up in the United States, where he later married a child survivor of Bergen-Belsen. The two helped found the Fortunoff Archive. And, over time, Hartman's stunning intellect turned increasingly not only to Jewish memory but to Jewish texts. He also helped found Yale's Judaic studies program.

Early in my professional life, I was among a cluster of junior professors presenting our research at a conference on Holocaust writing. After the conference, Hartman approached me and invited me to write a chapter in a book he was editing. The deadline was tight, and my chapter entailed several sets of revisions, all under the gun, so to speak. Mostly, what he wanted from me was boldness – to push further, to insist on ethics, to trust my intuition and my thinking.

To meet the deadlines but have maximum work time in those pre-email days, I sent off my revisions via FedEx. I learned that I could buy a few extra hours if I drove to the airport to dispatch my envelope. That experience marked the beginning of a mentorly relationship that lasted many years, even through his recent illness. Eventually, I was privileged to co-teach a seminar for university professors with him at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

We are now at the shloshim – a month after Geoffrey Hartman passed away. This personal reflection is a form of hesped (eulogy) on behalf of a valued teacher. May his name be for a blessing. ■

Portraiture and Jewish history

Michael Taube

A few weeks ago, apropos of nothing, I went to one of my bookshelves and plucked out something I've been meaning to read for a while.

In a section devoted to art books, one unusual title has been lurking in the midst: Richard Brilliant's Facing the New World: Jewish Portraits in Colonial and Federal America (1997).

My wife and I gave this book to my grandparents, Max and Rhona Alexandroff, on the occasion of their 60th wedding anniversary in 1998. It was added to my collection when my grandfather died in 2003. (My grandmother followed him five years later.)

I've glanced at it several times, even read a few pages here and there. But I've never sat down and analyzed it until now.

Brilliant is the Anna S. Garbedian professor emeritus in the humanities at Columbia University's department of art history and archeology. His book was published in conjunction with an exhibit of the same name at the Jewish Museum in New York from September 1997 to January 1998, followed by one at the Maryland Historical Society in Baltimore from February to May 1998.

Then-Jewish Museum director Joan Rosenblum wrote in the book's introduction that it covered a "little-known but fascinating chapter of American Jewish life, culture and history." The artistic subjects were "typically leading members of their communities – men of affairs and women of good families." Prominent American artists, including Thomas Sully, John Wesley Jarvis and Gilbert Stuart, were commissioned to create these portraits.

Here's some perspective. America's Jewish population grew from about 1,300 to 1,500 in 1790 (when the first census was taken) to an estimated 4,000 in 1830. This comes out to roughly 0.03 or 0.04 per cent of the total U.S. population. In other words, the community was exceedingly small.

While some American Jews lived in poverty, a fair number were linked to mercantilism. This included Moses Raphael Levy, who owned ships, dabbled in real estate and conducted business both at home and abroad, and his eventual son-in-law, Jacob Franks, a businessman with shipping, wholesale and retail operations, domestically and internationally.

Hence, certain families had the ability – and disposable income – to hire portrait artists, a common practice among well-to-do Christians. Besides the New York-based Levy-Franks paintings, the book examines the artistic renderings of other families, including Etting (Baltimore), Myers (Norfolk, Va.), Israel (Wilmington, Del.) and Touro (Newport, R.I.).

There are some intriguing aspects in these portraits. Brilliant noted that Jewish portraiture in colonial and federal America "remained tied to an 18th-century bourgeois imagery of restrained sobriety, thereby maintaining the effective distancing of its subjects from the viewer." Most of these traditional paintings fit into the artistic movement of romanticism, although an underlying neoclassical theme is prevalent. A few portraits included objects (a chair, table, book or watch) that one would expect from this time period.

Anti-Semitism obviously existed in 19th-century America. Even in the cities, towns and villages where Jews had resided for decades, they were often seen as outsiders. Yet, there was "no overt attempt... to suggest the Jewishness of the subjects, either by including some elements of an allegedly distinguishing physiognomy – 'Jewish looks' – or by an identifying attribute, drawn from the world of ceremonial objects, usually found in Jewish homes but not in these portraits."

While their personal/religious lineage was important to them, their commitment and patriotism to America trumped all else.

"The very existence of these Jewish portraits," Brilliant wrote, "bears witness to the importance placed upon the deliberate confection of their faces and their fashionably clothed bodies as conventionally, and recognizably, 'American.'" Moreover, these portraits could be interpreted "as emissaries to a world indifferent or hostile to attempts to proclaim ethnic distinction."

There's much to be said about the great American melting pot. This thought-provoking book is proof that U.S. Jews used to take it seriously – and many still do. ■

The shepherd from Ramallah and Rob Ford

Bernie Farber

The circus that was Rob Ford came to a sad and tragic end on March 22 following his untimely death from a rare form of stomach cancer. Say what you will of Rob Ford, and many, including me, have had much to say, he was larger than life.

During my days with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), I had the opportunity of meeting Ford on a few occasions. Bombastic, irreverent and obnoxious to a fault, you never knew what would come out of his mouth. Indeed, a few years after I left CJC, then-mayor Ford attended a meeting of Orthodox rabbis, ostensibly to discuss the establishment of an eruv. Ford's speech that day to these rabbis pressed them to "squeeze councillors" for his pet project, funding a casino!

Shortly after that, I was present at the CJPAC (Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee) Action Party in 2013. That evening, just prior to leaving, I ran into an old friend and a former mayoralty candidate, Sarah Thomson. We chatted briefly, and as I took my leave, I shook hands with what appeared to be a very inebriated Ford as he was charging his way over to Sarah. The next morning, I saw the story in which Sarah accused the mayor of touching her inappropriately and demanded an apology.

But probably the most significant episode that proved to me the enduring and international impact of Rob Ford's notoriety happened on a visit to Israel in April 2014.

At the time, I was working for my dear friend, philanthropist Dr. Michael Dan. Michael had a great many projects that he funded, ranging from helping to improve First Nations health and assisting reserves to build economic bases on their reserves to providing grants for homeless youth. I had the honour of assisting Michael in many of these worthwhile projects.

One project dear to Michael's heart was the St. John of Jerusalem Eye Hospital, which is the only charitable provider of eye care in the West Bank, east Jerusalem and Gaza. Treating patients regardless of ethnicity or religion and despite inability to pay, the hospital is a bastion of medical expertise and tranquillity in an area that knows little of peace and health.

> Bombastic, irreverent and obnoxious to a fault, you never knew what would come out of his mouth.

Michael was considering a large donation to their work and asked that I visit the hospital in east Jerusalem to get a first-hand view of its amazing efforts.

It was a first for me spending my time almost exclusively in the West Bank. I was taken to one of the eye hospital's mobile clinics in the softly flowing hills outside Jerusalem, not far from Ramallah. Here, hundreds of Palestinians lined up for their eye examinations. Mostly poor shepherds, children, elderly men and women waited patiently in line for their turn to be examined.

I had the opportunity, with an interpreter in tow, to speak with many of those in line. One elderly shepherd who spoke a smattering of English approached me.

"Who are you?" he asked.

I explained that I was from Canada on a visit to better understand the workings of this marvellous hospital. He nodded sagely. "Ca-na-da" he said enunciating each syllable with great care.

"Yes" I nodded.

"Where from in Canada?' he inquired.

"Toronto," I told him at which time he broke out into a wide, beaming grin. "Toronto," he exclaimed, "yes I know Toronto – Rob Ford!"

And there you have it. The notoriety and explosive character of our one-time mayor was known from the streets of Etobicoke to the Judean hills.

Rob Ford was a flawed man with characteristics many abhorred. And yet his death at such a young age should give us all pause. Despite his overblown and unwelcome antics, he was a beloved son, brother, husband, and father to two young children. He had a tumultuous time on this earth. I hope he has now finally found peace. ■

Premier lays out details of Israel trade mission

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne has laid out the broad brush strokes of her upcoming trade mission to Israel, and the emphasis will be on mutual areas in high-tech, life sciences and information technology.

Wynne will also build on past partnerships with Israel, she told reporters April 6 after touring the Peter Gilgan Centre for Learning and Research at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

Wynne announced she would visit Israel last June, when she was presented the Words & Deeds Leadership Award by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The May 15-20 mission will take Wynne and leaders of some 20 Canadian companies to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, as well as Ramallah and Bethlehem in the West Bank.

There's no word yet on whether she'll meet with Israeli or Palestinian political leaders.

"Israel is a priority market for Ontario for trade and research," Wynne said. "In 2015, two-way trade between Ontario and Israel was valued at over $900 million, making Israel one of Ontario's largest trading partners in the Middle East."

The premier will meet business leaders, innovators and government officials to strengthen ties and encourage new investments and partnerships in Ontario, said a press release from her office.

"I'm very excited about it," Wynne said.

"Ontario and Israel share many common priorities," she added. "Both regions are hubs for R&D, for ICT [information and communication technology] and venture capital, and both are interested in developing strong, competitive business environments that spur innovation and growth. I think that innovation spark is very important."

Wynne was joined by representatives from the Ontario Brain Institute, which was kick-started following a 2010 meeting in Israel between then-Israeli president Shimon Peres and former premier Dalton McGuinty.

The institute is a "perfect example of partnership," she said.

Wynne also cited the 2005 Ontario-Israel Memorandum of Understanding, in which each side committed about $1 million to facilitate a dozen joint economic ventures.

The MOU has helped connect more than 680 Ontario and Israeli researchers, generate 15 industry-led R&D projects and leverage more than $16 million in outside funding, she noted.

Both jurisdictions are leaders in life sciences, a sector that generated more than $38 billion in revenue in Ontario in 2012, Wynne's office pointed out.

"This mission will be a great opportunity for Ontario to build on its existing relationship with Israel, which is a strong one, and to find new ways for the two regions to work together across a range of research and innovation sectors," she said.

In response to a question from The CJN on whether she will bring any political messages to the region, Wynne said: "The message I will be bringing to Israel is an economic one. It is that Ontario is open and willing to find more ways to partner, and we consider Israel a very close friend and trading partner, and look forward to strengthening that relationship."

Accompanying Wynne at her announcement was DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general in Toronto, who said his country is "very excited by this visit not only because it represents the strong friendship between Ontario and Israel but also because it will allow both Israel and Ontario to showcase and advance strong and mutually beneficial trade."

Schneeweiss pointed out to reporters that Israel is roughly the size of Lake Ontario.

"Nevertheless, there are immense opportunities for genuinely valuable collaboration between us and for both sides, based on life sciences, water, information technology, cyber security and many other areas. We have no doubt that the more both sides invest in Ontario-Israel ties, the bigger the return on investment will be for the citizens of both societies and beyond."

The make-up of the delegation wasn't announced. "The business delegates are still being finalized," said Gurvinder Singh, Wynne's press secretary. "As with other similar missions, business delegates will pay their own way."

Sara Lefton, the Greater Toronto Area vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, will be on the trip, CIJA said, while B'nai Brith Canada confirmed that its CEO, Michael Mostyn, will also go. ■

Rights museum criticized for featuring Palestinian doctor

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

University of Manitoba professor Haskel Greenfield is expressing outrage about an exhibit at the Canadian Museum for Human Rights that highlights, among others, the story of Izzeldin Abuelaish, a Palestinian doctor from Gaza who lost three daughters and a niece when an Israeli missile hit his home during Operation Cast Lead in 2009.

In Greenfield's words, the interactive exhibit that includes Abuelaish is "a disgusting, one-sided portrayal of a complex situation. It completely ignored the fact that Hamas used yards and roofs of residences, schools and hospitals to launch their missiles. The Palestinian family portrayed was a tragic example of collateral damage in a war started by their Hamas government."

Greenfield, a world-renowned archeologist and acting head of U of M's Judaic studies program, added that the individual explaining the exhibit to visitors showed "a total lack of knowledge of the incident and the larger context."

He said it's "very clear to me that the exhibit is not about human rights at all. It is an opportunity for Israel bashing and subtle anti-Semitism. The exhibit only focuses on what the Israelis have done to Palestinians – and, in particular to one Palestinian family – without any context as to why it happened."

The fifth-floor Rights Today gallery, one of 10 "core galleries" at the museum, opened in November 2014. A few of the other individuals profiled are Canadian folk singer Buffy Sainte-Marie and children's rights advocate Craig Kielburger. Museum spokesperson Maureen Fitzhenry said the exhibit is changed when its steering committee or researcher co-ordinator feels there's a need and resources allow.

Abuelaish, who is now an associate professor of global health at the University of Toronto, is scheduled to speak at the museum on April 20.

During the years that the Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg was under construction, there was concern expressed that it would focus too much on the Holocaust. There were also concerns raised that Aboriginal issues wouldn't receive enough attention.

Greenfield's complaint is the first time the museum has come under criticism since it opened in September 2014, and the first time it has been taken to task for an exhibit connected to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, although at the official opening, a small group of Palestinians demonstrated against the facility.

Fitzhenry said Abuelaish's story is one of 17 profiles of a number of human rights defenders with diverse backgrounds that are currently being featured in the Rights Today gallery. "This particular exhibit… is intended to show how the challenge of defending and promoting human rights around the world involves many people, including Canadians, working in many different fields."

She noted that Abuelaish was born and raised in a refugee camp and grew up in dire poverty, but still managed to become a highly educated doctor who uses health care as way to promote human rights.

"He is also committed to helping women in the Middle East access post-secondary education, through a foundation he established after the death of his daughters," Fitzhenry said.

"His personal tragedy… is only one aspect of his story. Despite this tragic event, he refuses to hate. Instead he works for peace, understanding and reconciliation. He believes that if we treat each other with decency and respect, if we refuse to take sides, if we claim responsibility for our actions, then getting past the ugliness of war and conflict is possible. His story illustrates one way that an individual can take positive action for human rights."

She added that Abuelaish's "story is relayed in a factual and non-judgmental fashion. It's not focused on who was to blame for the death of the children, but explores how his personal experiences – including this tragic event – shaped the human rights work he does today."

The point, Fitzhenry said, is to tell his personal story and what has shaped his work as a human rights defender, not probe the causes of the Arab-Israeli conflict. "Our aim is to explore Dr. Abuelaish's journey, demonstrate his ongoing commitment to peace, and encourage respectful discussion and dialogue."

In a Globe and Mail article in the summer of 2014, Abuelaish accused Israel of waging war against women and children, and practising genocide. "Battles should be directed against the occupation, which is the threat and enemy to all of us as Palestinians and Israelis," he wrote. ■

Composition of York U 'inclusion committee' criticized

sshefa@thecjn.ca

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said it's "a slap in the face" that one-third of York University's president's advisory committee on inclusion – formed in March after a controversy over a pro-Palestinian mural on campus – is made up of faculty who are on record as being anti-Israel.

In January, Toronto businessman Paul Bronfman made headlines when he announced he would withdraw financial support for the university's film and creative programs after the school said it had no jurisdiction to remove a mural in York's student centre that he considered anti-Semitic.

The controversy surrounding the mural also highlighted longstanding complaints about anti-Israel and anti-Semitic tensions at the university. Soon after, York president Mamdouh Shoukri announced he would form an advisory committee to "ensure inclusive respectful exchange of ideas, particularly on social and political issues."

The committee's membership was announced March 29. It consists of 16 York academics and administrators, one-third of whom Jewish groups say are anti-Israel.

"I think it's ludicrous the president of the university would expect Jewish students to engage with such a committee," Hillel Ontario CEO Marc Newburgh said.

"How could a sizable portion of the inclusion committee consist of members who have a clear record of anti-Israel activism?" he asked. "They couldn't find other members of the university community who had no position on Israel?"

Sara Lefton, CIJA's Greater Toronto vice-president, said it's "unimaginable" that a faculty member such as John Greyson – a former member of the defunct group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid as well as a filmmaker who withdrew his film from the Toronto International Film Festival in 2009 to protest its spotlight on Tel Aviv that year – would be asked to join the committee.

Other members who have expressed anti-Israel views include Faisal Bhabha, a law professor who spoke at an Israeli Apartheid Week event at Ryerson University, and liberal arts professors Saeed Rahnema and Narda Razack, both of whom support the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

"This was supposed to be what brought students together and made Jewish students feel safe, but it really is outrageous that this inclusion committee would consist of the some of the worst, most vocal anti-Israel activists at the university," Lefton said.

Mamdouh Shoukri

"We're at a point now where the Jewish community's frustration and anger with York University is quickly reaching a boiling point. We're looking at this committee, and it really is a slap in the face to the community... this is something that is going to cause more division. It is going to make our students feel even more unsafe, it is going to further anti-Israel environment on campus, but really, it's becoming more and more clear that York isn't interested in fostering an inclusive environment for its students, and that is the most difficult thing for our community."

Also on the committee are Carl Ehrlich, director of the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies; history of science professor Bernie Lightman; and Lorne Sossin, dean of Osgoode Hall Law School.

In January, Sossin responded to the mural controversy with a post on York's website that said although he was "a proud member of York University's community and the Jewish community... [no one] should be able to unilaterally declare the views of others in our community as 'hate' and call on the university to censor them."

York spokesperson Janice Walls said the university is "disappointed" by CIJA's decision to express "outrage" about the committee, adding that "our policies do not support BDS or divestment from specific categories of companies... It is not in the mandate of the inclusion committee to discuss BDS."

Bhabha said a political opinion about Israel shouldn't affect his ability to sit on the committee. "My opinion about BDS is irrelevant and doesn't entitle anyone to be 'outraged' about my inclusion on an inclusion committee that nobody knows really anything about yet. The outrage appears driven more by bigotry and fear-mongering than reasoned objection," he said.

Rahnema agreed his support for BDS shouldn't be a factor. "Being critical of the policies of the Israeli government should not lead to misplaced 'outrage.' BDS has diverse support, including among many Israeli and Jewish communities who are worried about the worsening situation there," he said.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal for Holocaust Studies head Avi Benlolo also criticized the committee's composition. "This really is a missed opportunity," he said. ■

Panelists debate the future of European Jews

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Bret Stephens

Journalist Bret Stephens reached deep into the past for a look into the future, and what he found suggested European Jews ought to have their bags packed and be ready for a quick departure.

It was 1903 when anti-Semitic pogroms broke out in Kishinev, then part of the Russian empire, he recounted. Forty-seven Jews were killed, 500 injured and 600 homes were destroyed. At the time, Jews considered what to do. Some thought the troubles would pass, but his great-grandmother had a different perspective. It was because of her urging that the family packed up and moved to the United States, thus saving them from the fate of their co-religionists decades later at the hands of the Nazis.

Stephens, deputy editorial page editor of the Wall Street Journal, presented his dire prediction at a panel discussion at the Munk School of Global Affairs April 7. He was joined on a panel by Prof. Derek Penslar, the University of Toronto's Samuel Zacks chair in Jewish history, and Diana Pinto, an academic and writer who participated from Paris via Skype.

The topic under discussion was "European Jews and Israel: Security and Existential Dilemmas."

Stephens suggested a "bad smell" was permeating European society – the stench of anti-Semitism, which was never dispatched, despite suggestions after World War II that Europeans had finally put it behind them.

Stephens presented polling data that found in 2003 that 59 per cent of Europeans believed Israel was the greatest threat to world peace, and anecdotal evidence to show that anti-Semitism, often in the form of criticism of Israel, runs deep in European society. The evidence ranged from a British diplomat calling Israel "a shitty country" to the Spanish newspaper El Pais running a crude anti-Semitic cartoon of former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon.

The situation in Europe is being exacerbated by the immigration of one million Muslims, who bring with them anti-Semitic attitudes about Jews.

Stephens noted that 5,000 French troops were assigned to protect Jewish children at their schools and that approximately 8,000 French Jews left the country for Israel in 2015. (Only 1,775 emigrated in 2010 and 2,904 in 2013.) He wondered what it says about their view of France when they depart for a country where Jews are being stabbed in the street.

The trend is worrying, he said. "It would be foolish to wish [it] away."

Stephens' diagnosis and prognosis were disputed by both other panelists. Penslar suggested that this is not 1938 all over again. There is no state policy of anti-Semitism in any European country today, he noted.

If you focus on selective quotations from European leaders, you might ignore the fact that Jews have not seen their rights stripped, they have not been put into ghettos, and Jewish life in Europe is actually quite "robust," Penslar said.

"There is something to be said for cultural fluorescence and the desire to retain a way of life in light of physical danger," he added.

Penslar said factors other than concern over safety are prompting some European Jews to leave. In Antwerp, Jews are leaving for New York and London because the diamond industry is being taken over by Asians. The Orthodox are moving to Israel to live more fulfilling Jewish lives, he said.

Penslar noted that even former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert said Israel was no safer for Jews than other locations, though they could fight for themselves as Jews.

There is a psychological advantage from a sense of Jewish solidarity in Israel, Penslar said.

In the end, leaving France "is a very personal choice... Trying to find security in a world where security is rare, especially for Jews," he said.

Speaking from Paris, Pinto suggested the situation in France looks worse from the outside than it does within the country. There was solidarity with French Jews following the Charlie Hebdo and Hyper Cacher attacks in early 2015 and with subsequent terrorist events, it became clear the "war... is against all French life," she said.

Pinto, who has lectured widely on trans-Atlantic issues and Jewish life in Europe, said the complexities of modern life have also touched American Jews, where debates already experienced in Europe over boycotts, anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism are current. What's more, the traditional American relationship with Israel may be shifting, as the United States is influenced by domestic constituencies into becoming more Latin American- and Asian-oriented.

At a time when an Israeli NGO has opened an office in Berlin to assist Syrian refugees, "what you have now is complexity all over the place," she said. ■

Regavim seeks equal application of land laws

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Ari Briggs

Regavim is a small Israeli organization that's not afraid to take on much bigger opponents.

In the case of the 10-year-old Israeli NGO, it's the European Union (EU) that has come into its crosshairs recently for sponsoring at least 1,000 illegally constructed houses in areas in the West Bank that are under Israeli control.

Regavim, which calls itself a social movement that promotes "a Jewish Zionist agenda for the State of Israel," believes the EU is violating both Israeli law and international law in cahoots with the Palestinian Authority to establish facts on the ground, take over strategic land and blacken Israel's reputation when it responds as any sovereign nation would do to ensure the law is enforced.

Ari Briggs is director of Regavim's international department. He was in Toronto last week to publicize the organization's efforts to preserve Israeli sovereignty and reveal the steps taken by outsiders to undermine it.

Regavim asserts that between 2012 and 2014, more than 400 illegal buildings were constructed by the EU in the Adumim region of the West Bank.

The story has become a hot-button issue in Britain, which is considering leaving the European Union. MPs and others were asking why British funds were used by the EU to illegally build houses in the disputed territories that would ultimately be knocked down and even rebuilt.

Not only is the EU funding and constructing the structures, Briggs said, it's planting its flag on the buildings to deter the Israeli government from demolishing them. And it has claimed diplomatic immunity for its diplomats involved in the "humanitarian" construction.

Regavim claims Israel is ceding sovereignty over land to the Arab sector, including within parts of Israel proper. There is, Briggs has written, "a massive illegal construction in the Arab sector, in the south, centre and north of the country."

He cited the case of the town of Arara, where 20 per cent of homes were built illegally, even thought the town's municipal plan provides for the construction of thousands of additional residential units.

In addition, Arabs are building in nature reserves, creating a harmful environmental impact, and even within military "fire zones." The Palestinian aim is to hamper Israel training while the case winds its way through the court system, Briggs said.

Regavim's stated mission is "to ensure responsible, legal, accountable and environmentally friendly use of Israel's national lands and the return of the rule of law to all areas and aspects of the land and its preservation."

Regavim's legal and PR advocacy has raised hackles in some quarters, Briggs acknowledged, garnering bad press and the scorn of left-wing groups. Its Wikipedia entry, for example, cites critics calling it a "settler-colonial NGO" and one that aims to force the demolition of Arab homes and forced relocation of non-Jews.

Briggs disputes those characterizations. "We talk about the equal application of the law, which sounds like a liberal concept, but [left-wing activists] favour their own use of the law," he said.

With its resort to the courts, Regavim has taken a page out of the left-wing NGO playbook, and "they hate us for that. The court is one area that the left felt so comfortable in… We're catching them out at their own game," he said.

Briggs said illegal building violates the Oslo accords, under which the Palestinian Authority has control over areas A and B of the West Bank, in which 95 per cent of the Palestinians live. Israel controls Area C, a largely uninhabited area of state-owned land, and is responsible for all its building development. Regavim's research revealed that people in areas A and B were being offered free land, housing, water and electricity to move into disputed buildings in Area C.

Briggs rejected critics' claims the Palestinians are merely building on land they've always owned and Israel wrongly demolishes Palestinian dwellings while allowing Jewish ones to remain.

Regavim examined the data and found "it's 10 times more likely for judges to issue a stop work order for Jewish buildings than for Arab buildings," he said.

The public perception is the opposite, but that's "the big bluff" being advanced by anti-Israel activists, he added.

Regavim found 30,000 illegal Arab-owned structures in Area C and 6,000 illegal Jewish structures. Regavim uses drones to fly over territory under investigation, then compares before-and-after aerial surveys, which shows that the lands were unoccupied before Palestinian building began. ■

Orthodox rabbis take stand against assisted dying

plungen@thecjn.ca

Orthodox rabbis from across the country are calling for an end to physician-assisted suicide.

Citing the need to maintain moral clarity and opposition to policies that devalue life, more than two dozen rabbis have signed a petition objecting to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the 2015 Carter case, which struck down a law against physician-assisted death (PAD), and to a recent parliamentary committee report that expands the scope of the court decision.

"We state that any participation in PAD is forbidden by Jewish law," the petition asserts. "While the Supreme Court has decided to the contrary, we cannot be silent in the face of what our religious teachings and our conscience tells us is contrary to what is good and moral. We are committed to continue advocating for the value of life within our society."

The petition was prepared by Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto. It lists six specific reasons for opposing the legalization and normalization of PAD. They are:

- Only God gives life and only God can take it away. "Even people who take their own lives are committing murder;"
- Every living moment is precious and "by diminishing the value of a terminally-ill patient's life, society demeans the value of all human life;"
- People who are suffering may fall into depression or mental illness and can change their minds when their condition improves. "Resorting to suicide, even in the face of terminal illness, is a permanent solution to what is often a temporary problem;"
- A "slippery slope" could lead the medical establishment to encourage patients to end their lives "so as not be a burden on their loved ones and on an already overburdened health-care system;"
- Concern that health-care professionals who oppose the practice will be put into a conflict that pits their personal conscience against the demands of Canadian law;
- Imposition of PAD and a requirement that health-care practitioners participate in it – as has been recommended by the parliamentary committee – could deter members of many faith groups from entering the medical profession.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

Rabbi Strauchler said that following the court decision and parliamentary investigation into amendments to the law, members of the medical profession came to him for advice.

"They had tremendous concerns about how they would practice medicine," he said.

On March 9, his synagogue hosted a town hall forum in which the issue was addressed. At the same time, he and other rabbis reached out to other faith groups to see how they were approaching the impending changes to Canadian law.

After the meetings, "we felt it was important to offer a Jewish perspective coming from Orthodox rabbis," Rabbi Strauchler said.

The petition was prepared and circulated in Orthodox quarters. He is hoping politicians will consider it when drafting legislation that would take into account the High Court ruling and the committee recommendations.

Critics of the parliamentary committee argue its recommendations opens the door for "mature minors" to give consent to PAD, that patients with mental health issues will not be properly screened to see if they are competent, and that there will be insufficient safeguards for health-care providers to opt out of PAD.

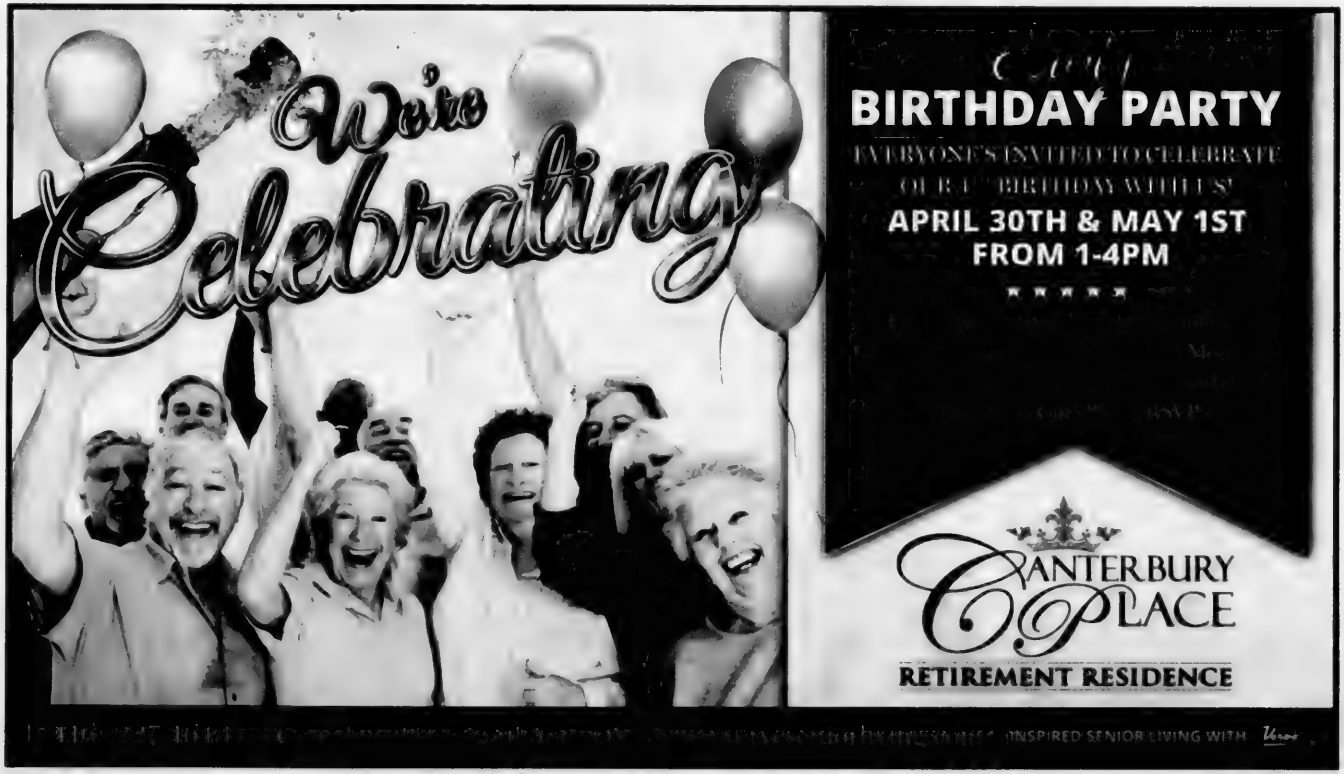
Rabbi Strauchler said the petition's signatories are hoping to keep alive the debate on PAD and on the value society gives to human life.

Despite the rabbis' unequivocal stand, Rabbi Strauchler said they're aware of the concerns of PAD advocates.

"When we hear voices on the other side of the issue, we do not believe them to be uncaring or acting with ill intent," he said. "We recognize there is great suffering at the end of human life.

"We recognize there is the other side to the issue and we hope to convince others of our position."

At stake, Rabbi Strauchler said, was nothing less that the "legal and cultural debate on the meaning of life." ■



Probe Laval graffiti as a hate crime, B'nai Brith urges

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

B'nai Brith Canada says the rash of spray-painted swastikas and other neo-Nazi graffiti in a Laval neighbourhood last month should be investigated as a hate crime.

"We get many reports of swastikas all over the city, but usually it is random. I have never seen that many [such symbols] in one place at one time," said B'nai Brith regional director Harvey Levine of the incident that occurred over the night of March 28-29.

"This took a certain sophisticated knowledge and research to know what these different types of symbols mean... It took time and effort to send this message."

B'nai Brith is convinced that more than one person was involved because of the differing styles of the drawings, he said.

Levine said that if incidents like this are not deemed suspected hate crime and rather treated as simple vandalism, the police generally give them a lower priority.

As of last week, Laval police were operating on the theory that a minor or minors are responsible for the graffiti, which appeared at 13 locations in the city's Laval-des-Rapides district.

Graffiti in Laval that was removed by Corey Fleischer FACEBOOK SCREENSHOT

The force's spokesperson Evelyne Boudreau said the graffiti, executed with the same paint, was confined to within about two blocks of Parc de Cluny. The park's chalet and benches were hit, as well as nearby homes, vehicles and traffic signs.

Because no religious or community institutions were targeted, the police have not deemed it a hate crime, she said. Very few Jews are known to live in Laval-des-Rapides.

Corey Fleischer, who owns a power-washing company based in Lachine, said he removed a total of 30 symbols himself, after the city of Laval had not cleaned off those on public property four days after they appeared.

On his Facebook page, Fleischer says he removed 22 swastikas; the rest included SS symbols, the code 14/88 (which apparently refers to a 14-word white supremacist slogan and "Heil Hitler," "h" being the eighth letter of the alphabet), and a Magen David with a line through it and the words "No thanks" above.

Fleischer, who for several years has been removing anti-Semitic and other racist graffiti in the Montreal area free of charge, believes what happened in Laval is a hate crime and is specifically directed at Jews. He feels the use of the Magen David leaves no doubt about that.

"[That] one, among all of them, resonates with me the most. If there was any question of who was targeted by these hate crimes, what ethnicity, this right here states everything," he says pointing to the Magen David in a video posted on his website.

Fleischer said he has removed many swastikas and the like in and around Montreal, in all kinds of areas, over the years, but not so many in one place. He warns of a dramatic increase in the prevalence of such incidents since 2014.

He is angry because he does not think government is taking it seriously.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is taking a muted stance on what happened in Laval.

"Obviously, any anti-Semitic graffiti is disturbing, but we will wait to see what the police investigation finds. We are confident the police are taking this seriously," said CIJA Quebec co-chair Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

Meanwhile, the Quebec minister for immigration, diversity and inclusion, Kathleen Weil, issued a press release on April 5 condemning a series of other recent "hateful" incidents that have been reported in the media.

She referred to the attack on the street of a Toronto man wearing a Sikh turban who was visiting Quebec City, threats made on social media against the co-president of the Association des musulmans et Arabes pour la laïcité au Québec (the Association of Muslims and Arabs for Secularism in Quebec), and insults directed at women wearing face veils on Montreal streets.

"The Quebec government condemns vigorously all words, threats and acts of a hateful, violent or racist character. These behaviours are unacceptable and have no place in our inclusive society, open to diversity," she stated. ■

Montreal's Radio Shalom goes off the air

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

With the long-struggling Radio Shalom 1650 AM signing off for good on April 1, there is talk of whether some Jewish content can continue under the station's new managers, evangelical Christians.

Stanley Asher, who was responsible for much of Radio Shalom's English content over its history, said he may be approached about the possibility of contributing a few hours a week, but he has reservations about doing so.

"I'm not religious, but I would be a little uncomfortable doing a program and then someone else coming on afterward talking about how wonderful Jesus is," Asher said. "I'm not sure any other Jewish people would want to either."

Radio Shalom was run almost entirely by volunteers. It is believed, at its demise, to have been the last Jewish radio station in this position in North America.

Asher was hosting five or six hours of programming a week before Radio Shalom went off the air at 6 p.m. on April 1. As it had for years at this time, Radio Shalom shut down for Shabbat and handed over the spot on the band to station CKZW, whose self-descriptor is "le son gospel du Québec."

But when Shabbat ended this week, CKZW continued on the air.

Radio Shalom founder and president Robert Levy warned Dec. 30 the not-for-profit station would close permanently if it was not bailed out of its financial problems by Jan. 31. When that self-assigned deadline passed, Levy said it would be extended because talks were continuing with Federation CJA and other parties, including outside the Jewish community.

Radio Shalom had been on the AM dial for a decade and could also be heard on the Internet. For five years before it received its licence from the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) and took the call letters CJRS, it broadcast via a subcarrier. As listeners had to have a special radio to pick that up, Radio Shalom's audience was very limited.

The station's roots are in the Sephardi community, and about 60 per cent of its broadcasting was French. Patterned on Jewish-content radio stations in France, it was independent and received no regular funding from any Jewish organization.

CKZW is now on air around the clock, operating out of the facilities in the Town of Mount Royal industrial park that were Radio Shalom's. The Christian station's founder, André Joly, has made known his intention to acquire the station from Levy, pending CRTC approval.

Levy declined to comment for this story.

Asher said the new managers may be required by regulation to include programming other than its usual Christian content. Under the licence granted it by the CRTC in 2006, Radio Shalom undertook to provide 30 per cent of its broadcasting in English, at least 90 hours a week of local programming, and, of greatest relevance, to devote 18 of its 100 weekly hours of religious content to "programs intended to ensure balanced programming."

Fifteen per cent of the air time was to be turned over to "programs produced by other religious groups," a clause Radio Shalom apparently honoured by letting the evangelical Christian group and, earlier, other religious groups have Friday night and Saturday.

The licence, which expires in August 2017, does not specify that CJRS must be a "Jewish" station.

"Disappointed, but not surprised" was how Asher described his feelings.

"At one time, there was a Jewish radio station in New York, but that closed. If a city with a Jewish population of three million can't support Jewish radio, it's hard to imagine Montreal could – and we have the French and English issue, too," he said.

Though he finds it hard to imagine working with an evangelical Christian station, given this community's history of seeking the conversion of Jews, Asher admits he is tempted and has made no decision yet.

A retired teacher who had broadcast experience with CBC Radio, Asher, 81, said he put in many more hours each week in preparation beyond his on-air time. He was grateful, because he loves radio and it has kept him occupied during retirement.

How many people tuned into Radio Shalom was never documented reliably, but a survey of 469 Jewish community members by Federation CJA last July found Sephardim and francophones were more likely to listen. However, about two-thirds of Ashkenazi/anglophone respondents said they were aware of Radio Shalom's existence. ■

Rights hearing delayed

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A Jewish hairdresser whose complaint of discrimination by his Jewish employer was upheld by the Quebec Human Rights and Youth Commission last fall is still waiting for the unsettled case to be brought by the commission before the Quebec Human Rights Tribunal.

Richard Zilberg worked for Spa Orazen (now Spa Liv Zen) from October 2011 to August 2012 when he was dismissed. He was forbidden from working on Shabbat by the business' main owner, Iris Gressy, because he's Jewish, Zilberg testified. Gressy, an observant Jew, operated the spa on Saturdays, but did not work there herself at that time. Zilberg said he was fired after telling clients about what he felt was an unfair directive from Gressy.

The commission recommended that Zilberg be compensated $20,000 by the spa and Gressy for material damages of loss of income and other hardship, moral damages, and punitive damages for intentional violation of his civil rights.

Zilberg's complaint was filed for him by the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations (CRARR), a non-profit organization combating discrimination. It took three years for the commission to release its decision, and the respondents did not pay him damages by the deadline set by the commission of Oct. 23, 2015.

Richard Zilberg

"Normally, in cases of non-compliance, the commission brings the file to the Human Rights Tribunal within a month or two," said CRARR executive director Fo Niemi.

The tribunal is a court.

"In our years of civil rights work, we have never seen this kind of prolonged delay, which is quite worrisome because employers and other institutional respondents will no longer take the commission seriously," Niemi said.

In January, CRARR wrote to commission chair Jacques Frémont about the the file and was told the lawyer in charge would follow up "in a few weeks." Last month, CRARR sent a second letter to Frémont and at time of writing, had yet to receive a response. The commission declined CJN requests to comment, citing confidentiality. ■

Debate over church tenancy turns ugly for Chabad

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Côte des Neiges-Notre Dame de Grâce borough councillor Jeremy Searle accused a Chabad rabbi of invoking anti-Semitism and trying to instil "Jewish guilt" in opponents of a proposed housing project on the site of the former St. Columba Church.

The April 4 borough meeting turned ugly after Rabbi Yisroel Bernath, director of Rohr Chabad of NDG, which occupies the hall adjacent to the main church building on Hingston Avenue, said the users of the centre have been the targets of "harassment, demonization and bigotry."

Searle said opponents have "put forward arguments, whether valid or not" as to why they're against the project that would have seen the main building demolished and seven townhouses built, while maintaining the hall. Chabad has been in the hall since September 2013 as rent-free tenants of the property's owners, the developers of the site.

Those in favour of the project, said Searle, have not made any argument, rather "just repeated the song of anti-Semitism... This is the Jewish guilt approach... because it's Jewish, you can't say anything against it... [It's] being used for all its worth."

He termed it "a vicious smear campaign."

Searle didn't stop there. If it's accusing opponents of a hate crime, he said, Chabad should press charges and prove anti-Semitism, which he denied had anything to do with the issue. Searle said he opposed the project because the modern design of the houses presented by the developers, principally Robert Blatt and David Kakon, did not fit into the neighbourhood where the high-value homes are often a century old. He said a more suitable project, including the hall's demolition, would likely have the neighbours' support.

Searle was reprimanded by borough mayor Russell Copeman and councillors Lionel Perez and Marvin Rotrand for his accusation. Rotrand said he was "personally offended" and Perez denounced it as "inappropriate and wrong."

Searle was alone among six council members in voting against a motion tabled by Copeman at the meeting to withdraw council's support for the development.

Copeman said because 224 residents had signed a register on March 17 opposing the project, well above the 166 minimum, the council had two choices: hold a referendum on the issue, which "I do not believe would be in the best interests of the borough," or abandon the rezoning bylaw.

"I'm disappointed, because I thought it was a good project," he said, adding that the former church has limited heritage value, a reason many opponents have cited.

The former St. Columba Church

Chabad's future in the property is uncertain. The developers have not publicized their intentions. Its understanding with them in 2013 was that it would buy out its share of the property within 18 months. Chabad estimated it needed to raise $1 million to cover the purchase and renovations to the building, which is about a century old.

That didn't happen, because even if Chabad had the money, it could not make the purchase because the land registry had not divided the property in two, and that won't happen until the developers secure the rezoning, Rabbi Bernath told The CJN.

At the borough meeting, held at Federation CJA's Gelber centre, Rabbi Bernath said that over the past two years, Chabad has been the target of "exaggerated and unfounded complaints... [and] unreasonable scrutiny" by local residents.

Perez, a Montreal executive committee member, said he's seen the debate "evolve" from mainly complaints that Chabad's presence represents a "nuisance" and even a security risk, and is bringing "unwanted elements into the neighbourhood," to being more about preserving a heritage site.

Copeman declined to assign a blanket motive to the opposition, but did recall a disturbing incident at a public consultation last fall, when a man made a Nazi salute at him. He said that was "clearly anti-Semitic" and reported the incident to police.

Diane Chambers, a 38-year nearby resident, said she signed the register because she felt the houses' design did not fit in, and that the entrance to a proposed underground garage was in an unsafe place.

The day after the meeting, a shaken Rabbi Bernath said he was "shocked" by Searle's comments. "I purposely have not raised anti-Semitism," he said, adding that Chabad is now "in limbo. The developers are not sure what they are going to do."

Chabad is almost able to buy the hall. "We do have money for a down payment and a mortgage is in place. We just need another $100,000 to make it work." Rabbi Bernath said the developers have offered to sell the entire property, but with a price tag of close to $2 million, that's "a very big decision." ■

Groups don't take stance on Israeli-Palestinian conflict

The key to Jewish-Muslim interfaith work is understanding each others' histories and the persecution faced by others, said Shahina Siddiqui, president of the Canadian branch of the Islamic Social Services Association (ISSA), located in Winnipeg.

"We know that Jews and Muslims have always worked together historically and that Jews have, historically, sought refuge among Muslims," she said.

Developed in 2003 as an offshoot of the Washington, D.C.-based non-profit, ISSA Canada provides health and social services to members of the Muslim community and does interfaith work.

In collaboration with Jewish groups, ISSA has held forums on issues like anti-Semitism and Islamaphobia, and worked with Winnipeg's Congregation Shaarey Zedek, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Winnipeg chapter of Independent Jewish Voices, which has been outspoken in its criticism of Israel and supports boycotting the Jewish state.

Several years ago, ISSA Canada collaborated with local Jewish groups to organize a protest against Quebec's proposed charter of values, which would have prohibited public sector employees from wearing religious symbols.

"Winnipeg is a small community... We may not do huge [interfaith] conferences, but on a person-to-person, community-to-community level, there's constant outreach between [groups]... I find it's important not to always talk through the lens of Israel and Palestine. That becomes a barrier," Siddiqui said.

While Israel can't always be excluded from the conversation, she said, it's important that the issue not define the Jewish-Muslim relationship in Canada.

"My Jewish friends and I are like family to each other, and we look at how to build our communities here rather than looking to an issue we may have different political views on... Interpersonal relationships – that's how you build understanding," she stressed.

Alia Hogben lives near Kingston and is executive director of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW).

Founded in 1982, the CCMW is committed to promoting equality and empowerment for Canadian Muslim women, and is also active in interfaith dialogue.

With chapters across Canada, CCMW has worked with, for example, Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto and groups such as Na'amat Canada, which seeks to enhance the lives of women and children in Canada and Israel.

Hogben said CCMW deliberately takes no political stance on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"We're very sorry about the whole thing, but we feel we can't resolve it... We keep it aside because there are many areas of common ground we can work on," she said.

Last summer in Montreal, representatives from the Jewish and Muslim communities met to discuss establishing greater contact and collaboration.

In December, the communities met again to talk about responses to the Syrian refugee crisis.

Rabbi Lisa Gruschow of Montreal's Temple Emanu-El Beth Sholom, who was involved in both meetings, said she hasn't been aware of much Jewish-Muslim dialogue in the city since, speculating that it's because the refugee crisis seems to be "the area that's mobilizing people right now... this will hopefully lead to deeper relationships between our communities."

Noting that, "the challenge will be taking the leap from positive feeling to organization," Rabbi Gruschow said that undertaking shared projects seems to be an optimal way to foster trust.

"At the summer meeting, we spoke about the importance of, as a minority community, feeling like other minority communities have your back," she said.

Several years ago, after violence broke out between Israel and Palestinian supporters at a pro-Palestinian rally in Calgary, local imam Syed Soharwardy reached out to Rabbi Shaul Osadchey of Calgary's Beth Tzedec Congregation, and the two founded what they call the Calgary Jewish-Muslim Council.

The group, which Imam Soharwardy said draws Muslims of varying backgrounds, meets monthly, and seeks to work at the grassroots level to bring Jewish and Muslim families together.

Last month, the group held what it said were milestone events: at the first one about 100 Jewish and Muslim families met at Calgary's Green Dome Mosque to learn about religious Muslim practices and share a meal. The following week, many of the participants attended a similar gathering at Beth Tzedec.

"It was eye-opening for those who previously thought Jews hate Muslims," Soharwardy said, noting that an initiative to get Jewish and Muslim families meeting in each other's homes is in the works.

"We think that having rabbis and imams talking to each other isn't nearly as effective as a Jewish girl talking to a Muslim girl, a Jewish family talking to a Muslim family, their children playing together. That's what will create friendship," he said.

This group also believes that it's not up to them to solve the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

"We wish and pray for it to be resolved, but we don't want animosity in our local community," Soharwardy said.

While the issue of Israel clearly lurks beneath the surface of Jewish-Muslim dialogue, many of those leading these activities maintain it can't be addressed before Canadian Jews and Muslims forge strong personal bonds – something that can be achieved by learning about other's customs and commonalities.

But are the grassroots Jewish-Muslim initiatives across Canada really laying the foundation for constructive dialogue of a more political nature?

And how do those at the forefront of these efforts envision a shift from friendship to serious political dialogue, and are there people who argue that the latter is simply not feasible?

It's a subject we'll examine next week in part two of our series. ■

Jewish exhibit planned to mark 150 years of Confederation

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

Plans are underway for a major exhibit marking the contribution of Jewish people to Canada that will open in Ottawa in 2017 to coincide with the celebration of the 150th anniversary of Confederation.

Under the leadership of committee head Tova Lynch, a small group of local volunteers has put together a proposal for what has been named "The Canadian Jewish Experience: A Tribute to Canada" (CJE) and is working hard at developing the various aspects of the project.

"Things are moving quickly," says Lynch. "Through our partnership with the National Capital Commission [NCC] which manages federal property in Ottawa, we now have an excellent downtown facility.

> We expect to be ready to tell Canada's Jewish story to thousands of visitors

Key people and organizations are coming on board and excitement is building. So we expect to be ready to tell Canada's Jewish story to thousands and thousands of visitors to the city in 2017."

The NCC has provided space in a building two blocks from Parliament Hill, in the shadow of the Peace Tower, which is an excellent location for tourists.

Three exhibit designers have been invited to submit estimates for construction of the exhibit and the committee is now actively soliciting funding from both public and private sources.

The estimated cost of the full project is $2.9 million, of which 40 per cent is expected from private sector corporations and government agencies. Fundraising is also targeting individuals, Jewish federations across Canada, private foundations and the corporate world.

In addition to money, organizers are seeking temporary donations of various other items, such as artifacts, medals of Jewish Canadian veterans, photographs, diaries and other appropriate items.

The exhibit will attempt to answer two questions: what has been the effect of the Jews on the identity of Canada, and what has been the effect of Canada on Jewish identity?

Volunteers from across the country will have a wide variety of opportunities to participate in the project, from acting as docents at the exhibit to helping organize cultural events, such as lectures and musical events, around the theme.

The CJE has the support of major Jewish groups, as well as Rabbi Reuven Bulka, rabbi emeritus of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas and a member of the Order of Canada, and Victor Rabinovitch, former longtime president and CEO of the Canadian Museum of Civilization (now the Canadian Museum of History) and the Canadian War Museum, both of whom are actively involved in the planning, organizing and fundraising.

Legendary spymaster speaks from the grave

NOGA TARNOPOLSKY
JERUSALEM

Meir Dagan came in from the cold, and out of the (political) closet, in 2012.

A year after he left the Mossad, which he led for close to a decade, Dagan gave a series of high-calibre, machine-gun-like interviews to The New Yorker, 60 Minutes and to all manner of Israel media, in which he transmitted a single message: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's bellicosity towards Iran is endangering Israel.

But, as it happens, he had much more to say.

Dagan, 71, who died last month after a long battle with cancer, took advantage of a malignancy he managed to keep at bay for some time to buy himself a rare luxury: a pointed, wide-ranging, final declaration from the grave.

Only, it didn't happen quite like that, said the investigative journalist and author Ronen Bergman, who spoke with Dagan in the context of 650 interviews he conducted for a history of the Mossad to be published next year by Random House.

In an exclusive conversation with The Media Line, Bergman told the story of the opportunity he offered Dagan, and Dagan offered him.

The conversations, running to a total of 400 transcript pages, took place during 2013 and 2014, after Dagan had broken the veil of silence during "what appeared to be a hopeful time," Bergman said. "We didn't speak in an atmosphere of deathbed confession... Neither he nor I were doctors, but he'd been through the transplant and while you could see he'd been sick, he was fine. But we both knew he had limited time left."

"I'd say that for Dagan, it was important to set the record straight."

"A lot had been said about Meir Dagan, not just about his time at the Mossad. I remember hearing that he'd been unhappy about an article saying that he'd been wounded in the Six Day War – which was untrue – so I came and said, here, you have the opportunity in the widest way to tell your side of the story."

For Israelis who saw a frail Dagan at a political rally against Netanyahu's 2015 re-election, his animosity towards the prime minister came as no surprise. But the vehemence of his condemnation still made headlines.

Netanyahu was "the worst manager I know," Dagan said, deriding Netanyahu for wishy-washy decision-making and for putting personal interests above those of the state.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lays a wreath at Meir Dagan's funeral last month. Dagan often criticized Netanyahu's bellicosity towards Iran. FLASH90 PHOTO

"The worst thing is that he's got a certain trait like (former Prime Minister) Ehud Barak – the two of them believe that they're the greatest geniuses in the world and that no one gets what it is that they really want," Dagan said. "He is the only prime minister – think about that – who reached a state ... in which the entire security establishment essentially didn't accept his position."

"The working assumption that it would be possible to fully stop the Iranian nuclear program by means of a military strike is incorrect," Dagan insisted, undoing the major talking point of Netanyahu's last two electoral campaigns. "That military capacity doesn't exist."

"If Israel attacks, (Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali) Khamenei will thank God," Dagan predicted. It would "unite the Iranian people behind the (nuclear) project and would allow Khamenei to say that the project was for peaceful purposes until now, but because we've been attacked by a terrorist state, we have to turn the project into a military project in order to defend ourselves."

Bergman believes that the most important issue for Dagan to get across was "his strategic understanding that war is a last resort and that force cannot resolve everything. It's a view he came to later in life."

"The whole subject of an attack on Iran was very important and part of this understanding, and within this, his sharp professional and personal dispute with Bibi," Bergman said, using Netanyahu's nickname.

Netanyahu and Barak did not shy away from attacking the erstwhile spy chief. "It is improper when former officials twist facts and attack their former bosses after they leave their post," a statement from Netanyahu's office read.

"It is not the job of a prime minister to rubber stamp his subordinates, but to craft policies based on a wide perspective of Israel's security and national interests, and that is what the prime minister did," the press release continued. "Dagan's statements during the battle against the Iranian nuclear program caused great harm to the struggle. Prime Minister Netanyahu will continue to lead the effort to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons."

Barak told Israeli media that he had "loved" Dagan, adding, "he was a great person who took the Mossad to new heights." But "every human being sometimes judges people through a personal filter."

In the paradox of his devotion to Israel and his opposition to its prime minister, Dagan left a unique legacy.

There's something more. Dagan, who fought cancer of the liver for several years, held an organ donor card. Last Tuesday, a 70-year-old woman who has not been identified and Avraham Gian, an 81-year-old Israeli, received the corneas of the former Mossad chief.

"I'm amazed to discover that the corneas of a hero of Israel like him were implanted in me," said Gian. "We are all in this man's debt, and now I most of all. Because of him, I can see."

It remains to be seen what the veteran Israelis will see through the old spymaster's eyes. ■

Half of Israeli Jews won't live in same building as Arab family: survey

JTA
JERUSALEM

While most Israelis oppose separation of Jews and Arabs in hospitals, nearly half of Israeli Jews would not live in the same apartment building as an Arab family, a survey found.

Some 49 per cent of Israeli Jews told Israel's Channel 2 that they would not live in the same building as Arab families, compared to 42 per cent who said they would be willing. Nine per cent said they were not sure.

The survey broadcast on April 9 comes after Jewish Home lawmaker Bezalel Smotrich said that Arab and Jewish mothers in Israel's maternity wards should be placed in separate rooms. His statement followed an Israel Radio report that some Israeli hospitals acquiesce to requests to separate Arab and Jewish patients.

Eighty-two per cent of Jewish-Israeli respondents said they would let an Arab doctor treat them, while 13 per cent said they would not.

Some 34 per cent of Jewish respondents said they supported segregation between Jewish and Arab women in hospital maternity wards, and 61 per cent said they should not be separated.

The survey was conducted on April 7 among 505 Hebrew-speaking respondents. ■

Israel to investigate firms identified in Panama Papers

Leaked documents reveal PA president's son holds $1million in shares in Palestinian investment company

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israel's Tax Authority will investigate the Israeli companies and individuals that were identified as having offshore accounts in a dump of leaked documents known as the Panama Papers.

The Tax Authority said it will look into whether the ownership of the companies and the assets held abroad were reported to the authority and if the appropriate taxes were paid.

Its director, Moshe Asher, told the daily newspaper Israel Hayom that some of the names on the accounts have not reported overseas assets. Asher said all the information in the leaked documents would be crosschecked.

Some 600 Israeli companies and 850 Israeli shareholders are listed in the Panama Papers as having offshore accounts. Among the companies are Bank Leumi and Bank Hapoalim.

The 11.5 million documents were published April 3 following a yearlong investigation of their contents led by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists and the German daily Sueddeutsche Zeitung.

The leak has caused scandals throughout the world. They provided details on the offshore holdings of a dozen current and former world leaders, as well as businessmen, criminals, celebrities and sports stars.

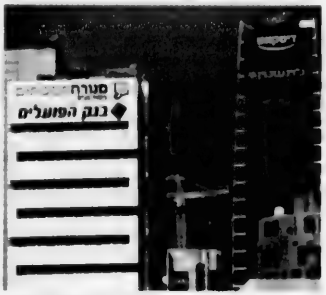
These have so far brought down the leader of Iceland and raised questions about the dealings of the presidents of Argentina and Ukraine, senior Chinese politicians and famous actors.

It has also turned up information that may be relevant in the restitution of Nazi-looted art.

The leaked data, which go back as far as 1975, came from the Panamanian law firm Mossack Fonseca, which is known for creating shell companies that often conceal the ownership of assets in the accounts. It is legal to use offshore accounts.

Journalists from 76 countries, including Canada, reviewed the documents.

Among the Israeli public figures listed in the documents are attorney Dov Weisglass, former bureau chief of the late prime minister Ariel Sharon, and Israeli businessman Idan Ofer.



Israeli banks Leumi and Hapoalim are among some 600 Israeli companies listed in the Panama Papers. FLASH 90 PHOTO

Also, the date leak revealed that Tareq Abbas, the son of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas, holds $1 million (US) worth of shares in a Palestinian investment company with ties to the PA.

The Arab Palestinian Investment Company, (APIC) launched in 1995, is today a major financial player in the Palestinian economy, with involvement in the food, medical and automobile industries, as well as public relations and a host of shopping centers.

Abbas' son Tareq was appointed to the board in 2011, a fact that was public knowledge. However, his personal investment in the company – $982,000 as of September 2015 – had not been known, Ha'aretz reported.

The PA does not directly hold shares in APIC, but the Palestinian Investment Fund, which has close ties to the PA chairman, holds 18 per cent of its stocks, Ha'aretz reported. APIC's board of directors has historically featured members with close ties to the head of the PA – previously Yasser Arafat and now Mahmoud Abbas.

Speaking on behalf of the Abbas brothers and APIC, attorney Kareem Shehadeh told Ha'aretz the firm was regularly audited and supervised by the Ministry of Commerce and the Palestine Capital Market Authority. Another source said that Tareq Abbas is a salaried employee from before his father became president. ■

The lessons of the Exodus and political realism in 2016

Gerald Steinberg

Officially, the Passover seder is a joyous and optimistic celebration of the transition from slavery and oppression to freedom and liberation. But on closer inspection, the images and themes paint a picture of human society and politics that is often brutal and violent. The stories of Pharaoh's cruelty, including ordering the drowning of Israelite baby boys, and, on the other side, the pain inflicted by the 10 plagues, ending with the deaths of Egyptian first borns, are cautionary tales. Looking at today's headlines from Syria and elsewhere, it's clear that mankind's capacity to inflict pain and suffering on others has not diminished in 4,000 years.

For Jews, the dangers of persecution do not end with the liberation from Egypt and the entry into the Land of Israel. During the seder, we are reminded that "in every generation, they arise to strike us down." And before opening the door for Elijah and our plea for a speedy messianic redemption, we ask God to pour out his anger against the tormentors.

Today, the tormentors are vicious terrorists who target not only Jews. Islamic State (IS) and Hezbollah attack and kill each other, as well as anyone who is not "one of them." The jihadi attacks in Paris, Brussels, San Bernadino and elsewhere are aimed at westerners. This campaign serves a reminder that while Israel and Jews are singled out for particular hate, the world continues to be a dangerous place, where anarchy prevails. Periods of peace and security are exceptions, some longer and geographically broader than others, but eventually, they come to a violent end.

The Passover story that we celebrate and repeat in every generation is not of peace and harmony, but rather of struggle. The Israelite march to freedom was also accompanied by the beginnings of self-defence. They left "with out-stretched fists," which later became a full-fledged army. In order to survive as a free people, Israelites had to be able to defend their lives and land.

> The Passover seder does a good job of separating the real world and the messianic ideal.

In the Jewish tradition, war and outbreaks of brutality and coarse inhumanity are built into the human condition. And war will only end when the Messiah comes, according to the prophetic vision, and the existing natural order is replaced, the lion lies down with the lamb, and nation shall not lift up sword against nation. But until then, we must be prepared to fight and defend ourselves in order to survive.

For Thomas Hobbes, the 17th-century British political philosopher, this central part of political life was obvious. To Hobbes, the founder of political realism, who was greatly influenced by the Jewish Bible, the environment of political anarchy – "the war of all against all" – is the state of nature. And for leaders (Moses, Samuel, David, and others) and everyone else, the need to fight for one's rights and survival as a people is obvious. War (including terrorism) is an integral part of the state of nature, and to ignore it is particularly dangerous. Even God is a realist.

During Passover, we have the opportunity to contemplate these lessons from the Exodus – from the beginning when a small tribal family of 70 souls went down to Egypt to buy bread, through the enslavement and sudden liberation. And as part of the commentary around the table, we might consider how these essential political lessons apply to our condition and the world today.

I would argue that the tendency to replace the realism of Passover and of Jewish history with an intoxicating messianism is mistaken. Such messages are inspiring and provide hope for the long term, but it is a mistake to confuse them with reality. The Passover seder, with the matzah – the bread of affliction, and the maror – the bitter herbs, does a good job of separating the real world and the messianic ideal. ■

Sanders seeks 'more balanced' position on Israel

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
WASHINGTON

U.S. Democratic party presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders said he was determined to take a "more balanced position" on Israel than other American politicians, rejecting the notion that he is more critical of Israel.

"Whether you're Jewish or not Jewish, I would hope that every person in this country wants to see the misery of never-ending war and conflict ended in the Middle East," he said in an interview April 10 with CNN's State of the Union talk show. "It's a difficult issue and good people have tried to deal with it for years."

While the United States must support Israel, he said, "you cannot ignore the needs of the Palestinian people in Gaza right now: poverty, unemployment, their community has been decimated. You can't ignore that fact. And you can't just be only concerned about Israel's needs. You have to be concerned about the needs of all of the people of the region."

He also reiterated that Israel's response during the 2014 war against the Hamas terror group in the Gaza Strip was "disproportionate."

"Israel has a 100 per cent – and no one will fight for that principle more strongly than I will – has the right to live in freedom, independently and in security without having to be subjected to terrorist attacks," he said.

"But I think that we will not succeed to ever bring peace into that region unless we also treat the Palestinians with dignity and respect, and that is my view."

Asked about criticism from Member of Knesset Michael Oren, an American-born former Israeli ambassador to the US, who termed his comments a "blood libel," Sanders asked, "Who is Mr. Oren?"

Told who Oren is, Sanders said, "I see. And he's attacking me for a statement I did not make."

Meanwhile his Democratic party opponent Hillary Clinton took a differing stance on Israel, saying that the Jewish state was entitled to protect itself against Gaza's terror group ruler, Hamas.

"Hamas provokes Israel. They often pretend to have people in civilian garb acting as though they are civilians who are Hamas fighters," Clinton told the same CNN talk show on Sunday.

"When your soldiers are under attack, you have to respond," Clinton said.

"It's a very different undertaking for Israel to target those who are targeting them. And I think Israel has had to defend itself, has a right to defend itself."

Sanders has also come under fire recently for misstating facts, including an accusation that Clinton had said he was unqualified to be president and a claim that the pope had invited him a conference at the Vatican.

The senator has repeatedly in recent days cited grossly inflated numbers for the Palestinian civilian death toll in the 2014 war in Gaza between Israel and Hamas.

In a New York Daily News interview last week, he said 10,000 civilians were killed by Israel's "disproportionate" attack on Gaza targets during the conflict, more than seven times higher than the figure given by Hamas, and higher still than Israel's assessment of the casualties.

On April 7, Sanders and his campaign belatedly acknowledged that the 10,000 figure was wrong. According to the Anti-Defamation League, Sanders told its CEO Jonathan Greenblatt that he had accepted a correction provided during the course of that interview, and that he would henceforth "make every effort to set the record straight."

Speaking on MSNBC the next day, however, Sanders again cited an incorrect figure – though far less inflated this time. Acknowledging that he hadn't known "the exact number" when he spoke to the New York Daily News, Sanders said that, "according to the United Nations, over 2,000 civilians were killed" in the war, and repeated his allegation that Israel's military actions were "disproportionate."

In fact, the UN's Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) puts the Gaza civilian death toll in the 2014 war at 1,423, while Gaza's terrorist rulers Hamas cite a similar number of 1,462. Israel has argued that the figure for civilian deaths is likely lower, since Hamas fought out of uniform in some cases and also had an interest in misrepresenting dead gunmen as civilians. Israel has also stressed that Hamas deliberately placed Gaza civilians in harm's way by placing its rocket launchers and terror tunnel openings in civilian areas. ■

Temple Mount off limits, Netanyahu reminds politicians

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reiterated his blanket ban on elected officials visiting the flashpoint Temple Mount compound in Jerusalem.

The move comes ahead of the Passover holiday, when many religiously observant Jewish politicians seek to visit the holy site in homage to the pilgrimages taken by Jews in biblical times.

Ministers and lawmakers, Jewish and Arab, were all told that the site, holy to both Jews and Muslims, would continue to be off-limits to politicians in a bid to prevent the stoking of further violence, the Ha'aretz daily reported April 10.

Netanyahu has also asked Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked and the security services to distance firebrand Muslim preacher Raed Salah from the Temple Mount.

"This man should be in prison already," the prime minister said, according to the report. "We're seeing attempts by Raed Salah to heat up the Temple Mount area ahead of Passover. This man is a one-man detonator."

Netanyahu first ordered Jewish and Muslim lawmakers off the site late last year, after the outbreak in October of a wave of Palestinian violence and terror attacks centred around claims that Israel was attempting to take control of the Temple Mount.

Meanwhile, a Shin Bet official told the cabinet that new statistics show a significant drop in attacks on Israelis over the past weeks, but stressed that counter-terror efforts would persist.

The last few months have seen a "significant decline" in the number of attacks, including in the number of "significant" attacks, the security service reported.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem on April 10 .
AMIT SHABI/YEDIOTH AHARONOTH/ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

The Shin Bet said figures showed three significant attacks in April, as compared to 20 in March and 78 in October, at the start of the uptick in attacks.

In a statement released by the Prime Minister's Office, the Shin Bet attributed the decline to Israeli efforts to foil attacks, along with "effective deterrent action" and "determined activity to counter Palestinian incitement."

The agency, which presented the numbers to the cabinet's weekly meeting last Sunday morning, said Israel's counter-terror activity has left the Palestinian public feeling that "escalation is pointless."

> Israel's counter terror activity has left the Palestinian public feeling that 'escalation is pointless.'

In a stark departure from the line maintained by Netanyahu – that incitement and Islamist radicalism are the prime drivers of violence – the Shin Bet said that most of the attackers were motivated by "personal issues," notably "a dire personal or financial situation."

Only some of the attacks were carried out due to "nationalistic motives," the ministers heard in the briefing.

Netanyahu alluded to the new figures, cautioning that Israelis shouldn't take the decline in attacks for granted.

"This drop isn't guaranteed," he said. "We can anticipate the possibility of severe terror attacks at any moment, but the fact is that we are acting against terror hotbeds, so that the terror we are contending with is mostly terror [carried out by] individuals."

Also on Sunday, Netanyahu equated his government's efforts in tackling a six-month surge in Palestinian terror attacks to the IDF's massive 2002 campaign to quash terrorism during the Second Intifadah.

"In 2002," Netanyahu said at an event in Jerusalem to commemorate Israel's deceased heads of state, "Arik [then-prime minister Ariel Sharon] decided to embark on Operation Defensive Shield, which received broad public support, to destroy the terror infrastructures in Judea and Samaria," the traditional Jewish terms for the West Bank.

The Palestinians learned at the time "that we don't hesitate to penetrate deep into [PA territory] in order to restore security for the citizens of Israel," he said.

Netanyahu asserted that his government has been acting according to the same principles, "entering everywhere, whenever it's needed, west of the Jordan [River]." ■

PA condemns settlements in draft resolution

JTA
JERUSALEM

The Palestinian Authority (PA) is circulating to UN Security Council members a draft resolution condemning Israeli building in the West Bank and Jerusalem.

The resolution, which PA President Mahmoud Abbas reportedly is hoping to bring to a vote in two weeks, was reported last week by Ha'aretz, which cited western diplomats and senior Palestinian officials.

In a statement issued in response, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Abbas "is taking a step that will push negotiations further away.

"The only way to advance peace is by direct negotiations, and Abu Mazen is avoiding this," Netanyahu said, using Abbas' nom de guerre. "The Palestinians educate their children on a daily basis that the settlements are Tel Aviv, Haifa and Acre."

According to Ha'aretz, the move to condemn the settlements has been in the works since the beginning of the year. A senior Palestinian official told the Israeli daily that Abbas will be arriving in New York on April 22, Passover eve, to attend the planned vote.

Abbas is also expected over the next two weeks to make diplomatic visits to Paris, Berlin and Moscow to build support for the resolution.

The Security Council last voted on such a resolution in February 2011. It was approved but vetoed by the United States.

According to Ha'aretz, the draft states that the settlements are an obstacle to peace and Israel must stop construction. The resolution also condemns settler violence against Palestinians.

The Times of Israel reported that the draft begins by reiterating the Palestinian demand that Israel "immediately and completely cease all settlement activities in the occupied Palestinian territories, including east Jerusalem," which it calls Israel's "legal obligations in this regard."

The draft singles out Israeli settlers, calling for the prevention of "all acts of terror, violence, destruction, harassment and provocation by Israeli settlers, and calls for accountability for the perpetration of all such illegal actions."

While making no specific mention of Palestinian terrorism, the draft also calls for both parties "to refrain from provocative actions, incitement and inflammatory rhetoric, with the aim, inter alia, of de-escalating the situation on the ground, rebuilding trust and confidence, demonstrating through policies and actions a genuine commitment to the two-state solution and creating the conditions necessary for promoting peace." ■

Passover: 'Ta'am' to gather together around the table

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A Ta'am to Remember: Recipes and Recollections from the Terraces of Baycrest, is a heartwarming collection of 192 recipes from 73 residents of the Terraces. It also includes 40 recipes that are perfect for Passover. Each recipe is accompanied by the resident's personal anecdote. Their memories, both poignant and funny, are snapshots of Jewish life from the Great Depression, World War II, the postwar years, and up to the present.

A Ta'am to Remember was a grassroots project, eight years in the making. Dozens of volunteers tested recipes, interviewed residents, and were involved in other aspects of the project. Residents also assisted with the planning and sales. I was privileged to be the recipe editor and consultant (some of my favourite recipes have been included). Elaine Kaplan was the project co-ordinator, working with Sheila Smyth, former director of the Terraces, who continued to provide guidance and assistance even after she retired.

Sadly, only about a dozen of the residents are still alive. Most of them have passed away, including Rachel Orlan, who conceived the idea of publishing a cookbook as a Terraces fundraiser. Proceeds from the sale of A Ta'am to Remember support programs and projects by the Terraces Resident Council.

David (Sonny) Langer, a well-known Toronto caterer who was the first administrator of the Terraces, and his wife Lorraine, provided major funding for this cookbook project.

Bake about 40 minutes or until golden.

Remove loaves from oven and reduce oven temperature to 300. Let loaves rest slightly, about 5 minutes. Loosen edges of loaves from pans with a sharp knife and invert onto a cutting board.

Use a clean towel to hold the hot loaf. Slice as thinly as you can, about 1/2-in. thick. For best results, slice while hot.

Place slices cut-side up on a cookie sheet lined with parchment paper.

Bake 30 minutes, until dry and brown. Yield: 2-3 dozen. Freezes well. ■

JUDY BART KANCIGOR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

If you never thought you would hear the words "healthy" and "Passover" in the same sentence, think again. "Quinoa is the greatest new addition to the Passover pantry," says Paula Shoyer, author of The New Passover Menu (Sterling Epicure) Gluten-free and high in protein, quinoa is a rich source of B vitamins, iron, magnesium, phosphorus and zinc. And although it resembles some Passover forbidden grains, it is considered a pseudocereal and is actually related to beetroots and spinach.

Because of its high protein content, quinoa is even being considered by NASA as a possible crop in their Controlled Ecological Life Support System for long-term space flights, but we love it as a welcome source of variety for the eight-day holiday. "It finally received definitive rabbinic approval for Passover in 2014," notes Shoyer, "after a rabbi was dispatched to Peru and Bolivia to see how quinoa is grown. He learned that quinoa grows at very high altitudes, while the grains that are prohibited on Passover are grown much farther below it. The authorities concluded that there was no risk of intermingling."

In addition to Shoyer's Crunchy Quinoa with Sweet Potatoes and Cranberries, she also recommends her Roasted Peppered Carrots, another healthful and vibrantly coloured addition to your Passover table. To prepare the dish, cut twelve large carrots into matchsticks, toss with 1-1/2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil and 1/4 tsp. black pepper, and roast at 400, stirring once or twice, until you can just pierce them with a fork, about 25 minutes.

It is Passover after all, and the old adage "everything in moderation" comes especially to mind for those mindful of their health and weight when faced with the endless and tempting Passover dessert buffet. What is it about the restrictions of Passover that seem to challenge Jewish bakers to create ever more unusual and satisfying desserts?

"Passover is the holiday when you have to be a home baker," Shoyer explains. "Even major cities have few bakeries, if any, that sell Passover desserts, and if they do, they are usually not worth eating. The packaged Passover cakes and cookies often taste like cardboard. If you want flavourful Passover desserts, you have to bake them yourself."

Fortunately Shoyer, a graduate of the Ritz Escoffier pastry program in Paris and widely known for her previous baking books, The Kosher Baker and The Holiday Kosher Baker, has provided a wide variety of Passover choices in her new book, including Triple Chocolate Biscotti, Glazed Chocolate Fudge Sponge Cake, Pistachio and Strawberry Roll, Pear Frangipane Tart and Cheesecake with Roasted Cashew and Chocolate Crust.

"Flourless chocolate cake is ubiquitous at Passover, but I began to tire of the same recipe year after year," recalls Shoyer, who adorns this version with a lovely, comforting marshmallow topping. And bittersweet chocolate is loaded with antioxidants, so enjoy!

Crunchy quinoa with sweet potatoes and cranberries

"My husband, Andy, eats quinoa for breakfast with blueberries all Passover long," says Shoyer. "This dish is a great combination of colour and texture."

- ❑ 1 cup quinoa, rinsed
- ❑ 2 cups water
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt, or more to taste, divided use
- ❑ 1 medium sweet potato, peeled and cut into 1/2-in. cubes
- ❑ 7 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil, divided
- ❑ 4 tsp. apple cider vinegar
- ❑ 2 tsp. honey
- ❑ 1 tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. black pepper
- ❑ 1/3 cup pine nuts, toasted
- ❑ 1/3 cup dried cranberries
- ❑ 3 green onions, cut into 1/4-in.-thick slices

Preheat oven to 400.

Place quinoa in small saucepan with water. Bring to a boil; reduce heat and simmer, covered, 15 minutes, or until water evaporates. Stir in 1/4 teaspoon salt. Off heat let quinoa sit, covered, at least half an hour. Quinoa may be cooked 2 days ahead and refrigerated, covered.

In roasting pan, toss sweet potato cubes with 1 tablespoon oil and 1/4 teaspoon salt. Roast 20 to 25 minutes, stirring occasionally, or until cubes can be pierced with fork. Set aside.

Dressing: In small bowl, whisk together remaining 6 tablespoons oil with vinegar, honey, cumin, cinnamon, 1/2 teaspoon salt and pepper.

Assemble: Use whisk to break apart any clumps of quinoa; transfer to large bowl. Add dressing; whisk well. Add sweet potatoes, pine nuts, cranberries, green onions and salt to taste, if needed. Mix gently. Serve at room temperature. Serves 6-8.

Flourless chocolate cake with marshmallow icing

"Here, I've dressed up this classic dessert with a sweet cooked icing that perfectly complements the bitter chocolate cake," says Shoyer.

Cake:

- ❑ 1 tsp. oil, for greasing pan
- ❑ 10 oz. bittersweet chocolate, roughly chopped
- ❑ 1/2 cup (1 stick) margarine
- ❑ 6 large eggs, separated, whites at room temperature (see note)
- ❑ 1 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa
- ❑ 1/2 cup sugar

Icing:

- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup warm water
- ❑ 2 large egg whites, at room temperature
- ❑ 1 tbsp. honey
- ❑ dash salt

Preheat oven to 350. With parchment paper, trace and cut out a circle around bottom of 9- or 10-in. springform pan. Grease bottom of pan with 1/2 tsp. oil. Press parchment circle on top. Grease top of parchment circle and sides of pan with remaining oil so finished cake will easily slide onto serving plate.

Melt chocolate and margarine over double boiler, or use heatproof bowl over saucepan filled with simmering water, whisking often until thoroughly melted. You can also microwave at 30-second increments, mixing after each heating cycle. Remove melted chocolate mixture from heat, add egg yolks and cocoa, and whisk well.

In separate bowl, with electric mixer on high speed, beat egg whites until stiff. Reduce speed to low, add sugar, a tablespoon at a time, and mix. Then turn speed to high for 1 minute.

Fold egg whites into chocolate mixture in four parts, mixing more slowly after each addition. Pour batter into prepared pan. Bake 35 minutes, or until cake is set when jiggled. Cake will puff up and look cracked on top, but will fall a bit when cooled. Refrigerate 4 hours to overnight.

To serve, open spring; remove sides of pan. With metal flat-blade spatula, separate parchment from bottom of pan and slide parchment and cake onto serving plate. Tuck waxed paper or parchment paper under cake to keep platter clean when icing.

Icing: Pour a few inches of water into bottom of double boiler or medium saucepan and bring to a boil; reduce heat to medium. Off heat, place sugar and warm water in top of double boiler, or in heatproof bowl that fits into saucepan without falling in. Whisk to dissolve sugar. Add egg whites, honey and salt; beat with hand-held electric mixer for 1 minute on medium-high speed. Place bowl over gently boiling water and beat with hand-held electric mixer on high speed a full 7 minutes. Remove from heat.

Trim any dry pieces from top of cake. If top of cake is uneven, place parchment on top of cake and turn over to ice bottom. With metal spatula, spread icing on sides of cake, then top. Smooth top and sides or, if you plan to toast them with a blowtorch, use small spoon to create waves or texture on top. Remove waxed paper or parchment pieces from under cake. Store cake in fridge. Use blowtorch to brown waved edges until golden-brown.

Note: To bring egg whites to room temperature in 10 minutes, separate eggs and place whites in metal bowl. Place bowl over another bowl filled with 2 inches of hot water. Stir eggs occasionally, and they will be at room temperature within 10 minutes. ■

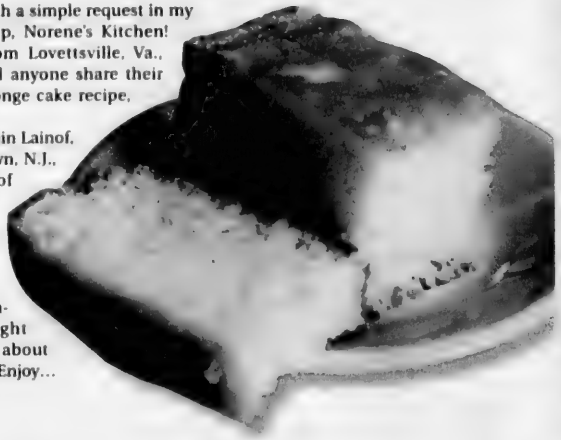
Pan pals share favourite sponge cakes

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



It all started with a simple request in my Facebook group, Norene's Kitchen! Joan Elkon from Lovettsville, Va., posted: "Would anyone share their Pesachdike sponge cake recipe, please?"

Elise Braunstein Lainof, now of Fair Lawn, N.J., and formerly of Calgary, posted her family's favourite sponge cake recipe and replied: "My mother-in-law taught me all I know about sponge cakes!" Enjoy...

Elise Lainof's Passover sponge cake

- ❑ 1 3/4 cups sugar
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 9 eggs separated
- ❑ 1/2 cup cake meal
- ❑ 1/4 cup potato starch
- ❑ zest and juice from 1/2 lemon and 1/2 orange (Mom uses just a whole orange and no lemon)

Preheat oven to 350. Beat together egg yolks and sugar, adding the salt, cake meal, potato starch, zest and juice. Blend well.

Beat egg whites in a separate bowl until high peaks form, but not dry.

Fold whites into batter gently by hand.

Bake for 1 hour in an ungreased 10-in. tube pan. Let cool upside down (see tip, below). Yield: 15 slices.

Elise's chocolate Passover sponge cake

(Variation)
Same as above but substitute the citrus zest for the following:

- ❑ 4 tbsp. cocoa powder
- ❑ 1 tbsp. vanilla extract

Elise's tip: "I cool it upside down over a coke bottle or with the rim of the cake pan on coffee cups."

Editor's note: The idea is to raise the top of the upside down cake pan so that air circulates all around the cake.

Later that evening, I met up with a close group of friends for a birthday dinner celebration. Of course, the discussion turned to food, and then to what we were preparing for Passover. We all love sweets, so of course we started discussing our favourite Passover sponge cakes. I convinced them to share their treasured recipes and recollections with you, my readers.

My friend, Elaine Kaplan, who prefers to edit rather than bake, commented: "Norene, you're 'sponging' off us! Now I will need to add everyone's cakes to my collection of recipes that I don't cook/bake!" Happy baking, happy, healthy Passover to all!

Sponge cakes are favourite ending to the seder meal

Tolsa Greenberg shared: "I always used to make my mother's sponge cake and loved it – that was my tribute to her. But my aunt, Pearl Caplan, said one day: 'Bake Ma's cake (my grandmother's) instead – you'll find it more moist.' So now I make my grandmother's sponge cake and make my mom's coconut macaroons and mandelbroit."

Tolsa Greenberg's 'Ma Kate's' Passover sponge cake

- ❑ 1 cup potato starch
- ❑ 2 heaping tbsp. cake meal
- ❑ 1 orange
- ❑ juice of 1/2 lemon (fresh is better)
- ❑ 2 tbsp. wine
- ❑ 9 eggs, separated
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Sift together potato starch with cake meal 6 times.

Squeeze juice from orange into a cup and add grated peel from top half of the orange. Add lemon juice and wine to orange juice. (Ma would always pour in a bit of water to wash the lemon off the squeezer.)

Beat egg yolks in large bowl of an electric mixer on medium high speed. Slowly pour in sugar and beat until light.

Add dry ingredients to yolk/sugar mixture alternately with juice.

In a clean bowl and with clean beaters, beat egg whites until stiff. Fold into yolk mixture.

Pour batter into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan with removable bottom and bake for 1 hour. Check with a toothpick for doneness.

Invert cake pan and let hang until completely cool. Remove from pan, using a metal spatula to first loosen cake from sides, bottom and centre tube. Transfer to a serving plate. Yield: 15 slices.

Variation: If desired, a cinnamon-sugar and nut mixture can be spread in the center when putting the batter into the pan.

Helene Medjuck emailed us photos of her favourite sponge cake. She had done a test run before Pesach to try it out, using chametz baking ingredients. "It's worth buying a can of potato starch to try it out before the big days. I do that sometimes with a new recipe to see if it's good before experimenting on Pesach. No time for flops then!"

Helene Medjuck's chocolate or vanilla sponge cake

(Gluten-free/non-gebrocht)

- ❑ 10 eggs, separated
- ❑ 1 cup sugar, divided use
- ❑ 1/2 cup oil
- ❑ 3/4 cup potato starch
- ❑ 1 pkg (3.3 oz) Passover instant chocolate or vanilla pudding
- ❑ Passover icing sugar and grated chocolate to garnish (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Place egg whites in large bowl of electric mixer and bring to room temperature. Beat whites on high speed, gradually adding 1/2 cup sugar. Beat until stiff, about 8 to 10 minutes. Set aside.

In another large bowl (or food processor), beat egg yolks with remaining 1/2 cup of sugar until well mixed. Add oil and beat until light. Add pudding mix and potato starch and mix just until combined. Batter will get very thick.

Using a rubber spatula, gently fold whites into yolk mixture, just until whites disappear. Make sure to fold in thick batter at bottom of bowl.

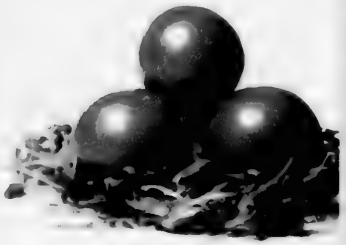
Pour batter into an ungreased 10-in. tube pan (preferably one with a removable bottom). Bake at 350 for 1 hour.

Immediately invert pan and cool completely.

Use a flexible metal spatula (or a knife) to loosen cake from sides, centre tube and bottom of pan. Remove cake carefully from pan and transfer to a cake platter.

If desired, sprinkle lightly with icing sugar and grated chocolate. Yield: about 15 slices. Freezes well. ■

Salads for Passover



DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Although tons of attention is devoted to the main course and the vegetables, especially on Passover, too often the salad gets relegated to last thoughts and hasty preparation. After all, what could be simpler than throwing together some greens and splashing some vinaigrette or dressing over them? I think salads are an essential part of any dinner and I actually think they're worth planning with as much energy as the brisket or the tzimmes.

Making vinaigrette is as simple as whisking together as little as three or four ingredients and usually benefits from an overnight stay in the refrigerator. A classic vinaigrette is usually three parts oil to one part acid – be it in the form of vinegar or lemon juice – but I tend to skewer the ratio a bit so that my vinaigrette has a bit more bite to it. The tang helps to counter the richness of the meal and pucker up your taste buds. But remember, vinaigrettes should just coat the leaves, not drench them.

There is such an abundance of different kinds of greens at the supermarket, that you can pick and choose, combining some bitter greens with more delicate leaves. And always remember to dress your salad at the very last possible moment, to keep the leaves as pert as possible.

Warm cherry tomato salad

- ❑ 1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 4 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 4 cups cherry or grape tomatoes
- ❑ 1/3 cup finely chopped red onion
- ❑ 1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 1 tsp chopped fresh thyme (about
- ❑ 5 sprigs)
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

Heat the olive oil in a large non-stick skillet set over low heat. Add the garlic and cook, stirring occasionally, until the oil is perfumed with the garlic. Increase the heat to medium-high. Add the tomatoes. Stir-fry until the tomatoes just start to burst or wrinkle, 3 to 5 minutes. Immediately transfer the tomatoes to a serving bowl. Stir in the red onion, vinegar and thyme. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Serve immediately. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Mixed green salad with oranges, dried cranberries and jicama

Vinaigrette:
- ❑ 1/4 cup freshly squeezed orange juice
- ❑ 2 tbsp cider vinegar
- ❑ pinch each salt and pepper
- ❑ 1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil

Salad:
- ❑ 7 cups mixed baby greens
- ❑ 3/4 cup thinly sliced peeled jicama
- ❑ 1/2 cup toasted pecan halves
- ❑ 1/3 cup dried cranberries
- ❑ 3 oranges, peeled and segmented

Vinaigrette: In a small bowl, whisk together the orange juice, vinegar and salt and pepper. In a thin stream, very gradually whisk in the olive oil. (Vinaigrette can be made up to 24 hours ahead. Bring to room temperature before proceeding with recipe).

Salad: In a large salad bowl, gently toss together the greens, jicama, pecans and cranberries. Pour the dressing over and toss gently until all of the salad is well coated. Gently toss in the orange segments. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Arugula salad with garlic matzah crumble

Vinaigrette:
1 shallot, minced
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. honey
pinch each salt and pepper
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil

Garlic Matzah:
2 sheets regular matzah
2 large cloves garlic, peeled and chopped
1/4 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

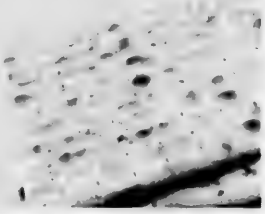
Salad:
8 cups baby arugula
1 bunch fresh radishes, stemmed and thinly sliced (about 8-10 individual radishes)

Vinaigrette: In a small bowl, whisk together the shallot, vinegar, honey and salt and pepper. In a thin stream, very gradually whisk in the olive oil. (Vinaigrette can be made up to 24 hours ahead. Bring to room temperature before proceeding with recipe).

Garlic Matzah: Place the two sheets of matzah on an unlined baking sheet. Preheat the oven to 350.

On a wooden cutting board and using the back of a knife or spoon, mash the garlic and salt together until a paste is formed. Transfer the paste to a small bowl. Stir in the oil; let stand for 5 minutes. Brush the olive oil, including bits of the garlic, all over the matzah. Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 8 to 10 minutes or until lightly browned and crisp. Set aside.

Salad: Combine the arugula and sliced radishes in a large salad bowl. Pour the vinaigrette over, tossing gently until the greens are well coated. Break the matzah into pieces; toss in with the greens. Serve immediately. Makes 6 to 8 servings. ■



Matzah meal desserts

FRANCINE KURLANDSKI
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There is a "half-baked" saying that when it comes to eating a Passover dessert, the best thing you could do would be to "pass it over." Matzah meal doesn't have to taste like sawdust, and to prove it, I am sharing some of my family favourites to give you an incentive to discover that Passover desserts can be both kosher – and tasty.

Passover traditions still hold sway, and it is wonderful to pass down recipes from generation to generation for delicious treats that will keep your family smiling.

Melting moments Passover cookies

- ❑ 4 eggs
- ❑ 3/4 cup Pesach oil
- ❑ 3/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ juice of 1 orange
- ❑ 1 cup cake meal
- ❑ 1/2 cup potato starch
- ❑ 3/4 cup of crushed pecans or coconut

Combine all ingredients in food processor and mix. Allow to stand 5 minutes.

Make dough into balls and dip into slightly beaten egg white. Roll into nuts or coconut. Place on a lightly greased sheet. Make a dent into the centre of the cookie ball. Bake at 350 for 5 minutes. Remove from oven. Place jam in the centres. Return to oven at 325 for about 10 to 12 minutes.

Lemon roll cake

- ❑ 4 eggs separated
- ❑ 1/2 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup cake meal
- ❑ grated rind from 1/2 lemon and orange
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt

Beat yolks with sugar until light. Add the cake meal. In another bowl beat egg whites until stiff. Fold the egg whites into the batter. Place parchment onto a cookie sheet and spread batter onto paper. Bake for 10 minutes at 375.

Remove from oven and place onto towel. Remove paper and roll up as for jelly roll and cool. Fill with desired filling.

Lemon filling:

- ❑ 2 well-beaten eggs
- ❑ 3/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 tbsp. potato starch
- ❑ 1 tsp. pareve margarine
- ❑ juice of 2 lemons
- ❑ 1 cup water

Mix sugar and potato starch. Mix all ingredients in a saucepan, except margarine until thick and clear. Add margarine last. Cool and fill lemon roll. ■

Passover apple pie

Dough:

- ❑ 1/2 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 1/2 cup potato starch

Emotional book explores living with cancer

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

In-Between Days, a graphic novel that combines comics and short essays that explore what it is like to live with incurable cancer, is, all at once, heartbreaking and heartwarming, revealing and honest, all the while showcasing how beautiful and unfair life can be.

Diagnosed in 2013 at the age of 37 with stage four metastatic cancer, for which the median survival time is about two to three years, Teva Harrison sat down with The CJN to speak about her heavy-hitting, profoundly personal and emotional work in her west Toronto home (in front of a plate of homemade vegan, gluten-free cookies and a pot of chamomile and lavender tea).

Harrison explained that when she took to the Internet to learn as much as she could about her illness, statistics and clinical information abounded, but when it came to finding literature about living with terminal cancer, she couldn't.

"There really wasn't… something that addressed the emotional side, as opposed to the clinical, and I felt like that might be something I could contribute, that might be helpful to other people."

She explained that the book came about soon after she started a blog to share the comics she had drawn to illustrate her challenges, fears and experiences living with incurable cancer, with the intention of helping others.

She said a month later the Canadian magazine The Walrus offered to post the comics on its site, and a month later she was contacted by publishing company, Anansi to discuss the possibility of turning them into a book.

"The book wasn't my idea at all at first," she said.

She said she agreed to do it, "partly because a book is such a fantastically tangible legacy."

The memoir, which explores life with illness, as well as her relationships with her "perfect husband" and loving family, is full of dichotomies, such as balancing hope with pragmatism, or managing pain, while avoiding medicating to the point of sensory numbness.

One of the essays highlights an identity crisis brought on by her survival instinct. As a lifelong vegetarian, Harrison would not use products that were tested on animals – except for cancer drugs.

"I had people who were angry that I'm a vegetarian, but I am for animal testing for cancer drugs," she said.

When asked if writing the memoir made it harder to distract herself from her illness, she said, "I'm going to be honest, I can't distract myself from it. It's a pretty consuming thing. I'm at the hospital every week, I take drugs everyday that are thankfully, right now, keeping my cancer stable, but it is front of mind, regardless of whether I process it or not. I think that, for me, looking straight at something makes it more manageable than looking away. Processing in a really proactive way, what is going on with me, has been really helpful in terms of my mental health and stability."

Teva Harrison

What keeps her going is a kind of pragmatic hope that allows her to move forward and live her life as best she can.

"If I didn't have hope I don't know how I could move forward and that hope is in some cases, very practical. Like, I hope I feel well now, I hope I can have the vacation we're planning, I hope I can carry through the promotion for this book, and some of it is big hope. When I see things like advances in immunotherapy or new clinical trials and new types of approaches to slowing the advance of the disease. But I'm also realistic. I come from a family with a lot of cancer and I've watched people die."

Harrison said she's proud of the book, and her courage to share some of the more difficult aspects of her illness, including sexual dysfunction.

"That was the hardest part for me to talk about, and that was the hardest part for my husband to let me talk about, because our friends are going to read this book, and our family, and it is very personal, but it's also something within the cancer community that people don't talk about enough," she said.

"I'm also really happy that I was able to take that digression and talk about my family. I believe that we live on in other people and I am in such deep respect and awe of the things my family have done, the way they've lived in service, and being able to contribute to their continuance was really meaningful to me." ■

CHAT almuni reunite to stage production of Rent

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I'm 24 years old and it's my first day at TanenbaumCHAT. No, I'm not a former student who's back for a reunion. Instead, I'm here to rehearse Rent, A107 Production's inaugural show.

Like many of my current cast and fellow ensemble members, I'd been searching for an opportunity to get back onstage. I also wanted to meet new, like-minded young people – a difficult post-grad task. But most community theatre troupes in Toronto are filled with children, and they don't cater to the schedules of busy 20-somethings.

"This is something that is specifically geared to young adults. And that's probably an element of the community theatre market that hasn't necessarily been tapped," says director Josh Sable. He's also a drama teacher and the director of student activities at CHAT.

For him, this process has been dually exciting. Not only is he launching a new community theatre initiative for Jewish young adults in Toronto, but he's also working with a group of his former students – about half of Rent's cast and crew members are CHAT graduates.

While some are carving out careers in the performing arts, many of us have rather unrelated 9-to-5 jobs.

"These are people who all have full-time jobs," says producer Danny Richmond. We're a group filled with lawyers, teachers and marketing professionals. But at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday nights those more sterile identities melt away as we belt out Seasons of Love and La Vie Boheme.

Like many theatre nerds, I discovered these songs as a tween. After all, Rent came out in 1996, but the movie version hit theatres in 2005 – that's when my Rent obsession really exploded.

And clearly I wasn't the only die-hard Rent-head excited about this performance. Our two-night run, April 18 and 19, at the York Woods Library Theatre sold out in less than six days. We've now added another show on Sunday, April 17.

Along with Rent's popularity, it has clear Jewish roots, making it an appropriate choice for this CHAT-alumni-and-friends production – it's also a show the high school probably never would have touched.

The late Jonathan Larson's semi-autobiographical rock opera follows a group of bohemians through New York City's East Village as narrator Mark Cohen (played by Ryan Peters) watches his friends struggle with love, heroin addiction and HIV/AIDS.

While the musical is set squarely in the late 1990s, the iconic piece still resonates today as it begs audiences to seize the day and to do their part to repair the world. So too does this production, as proceeds from all tickets sales will go directly towards Ve'ahavta, a charity that bills itself as a Jewish humanitarian response to poverty.

Richmond, who is Ve'ahavta's director of community engagement, sees parallels between his organization and the musical. "The show talks about, 'will I lose my dignity?'" he says. "It's that powerful question that we all wrestle with. And for Ve'ahavta, we work to help promote the dignity of others."

So far, it's unclear whether A107 will mount another show. When I ask Sable about it, he remains mum and instead chooses to quote Rent. "No day but today." ■

Tickets are still on sale for the Sunday, April 17 performance at www.nodaybuttoday.ca.

Bloomsday is coming, break out your Haggadahs

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Opening James Joyce's Ulysses is like opening a prayer book in a language you learned long ago but lost: its 930-some pages, largely without paragraph breaks, run in great long printed blocks like a river. Here and there they are interrupted by combative, cajoling Irish voices, set off, not like usual dialogue with quotation marks, but with the hard printer's dash, as a sign of an opening in the talk.

The novel's action takes place on one day – June 16, 1904 – in Dublin, whose streets are explored by Joyce's iconic figure Leopold Bloom. We meet him first in the kitchen, where he thinks of the things he likes to eat: "thick giblet soup, nutty gizzards, a stuffed roast heart, liver slices fried with crustcrumbs, fried hencod's roes." Not too much later we find him in "the jakes," the most famous outhouse in literature.

Joyce's book sits astride the momentous political and literary events of Dublin's early 20th century, but an element of its genius, and its universal influence, comes of Joyce's portrait of Bloom, the son of a Hungarian-born Jewish convert to Protestantism and then Catholicism.

A large part of the novel's fame today resides in Bloomsday, a celebration that takes place around the world on June 16, and includes readings of the novel, alongside events and presentations related to all things Bloomian and Joycean.

In Montreal, the Jewish Public Library assumes the role of lone Jewish outpost among the many city-wide venues for Bloomsday. Its contribution to these events in 2016 is a talk by Abby Bender, a scholar at New York University, based in part on her new book, Israelites in Erin: Exodus, Revolution, and the Irish Revival.

Israelites in Erin: Exodus, Revolution, and the Irish Revival
By Abby Bender
Syracuse University Press

> In Montreal, the Jewish Public Library assumes the role of lone Jewish outpost among the many city-wide venues for Bloomsday.

There are many ways to pitch Bloomsday as a Jewish kind of carnival: in New York, one might have encountered Jerry Stiller in Bryant Park, with the none-too-easy task of reading the Hebrewish (Hebraish?) hodgepodge that runs through Bloom's head: "Aleph Beth Ghimel Daleth Hagadah Tephilim Kosher Yom Kippur HanukahRoschaschanaBeniBrithBarMitzvahMazzothAshkenazim Meshuggah Talith."

Bender is interested in the weird Jewishisms of Bloom's day in Dublin, but more so, she examines the attraction felt during the latter half of the 19th and early 20th centuries by Irish nationalist writers, political and religious leaders to the Bible's Exodus story. Political manifestos, Sunday sermons, and influential plays like Lady Gregory's The Deliverer, explored the idea of the Irish as a chosen people oppressed by a wicked power, whose leaders were flawed and great like Moses, and whose "promised land" was just out of reach.

Bender traces the fall-off of this intrigue with Jewish stories when actual Jews arrived in large numbers from Lithuania at the end of the 19th century. By the time of the Easter Rising in 1916, the ethos of rebellion had become suitably sacrificial, making use of Christian rather than Jewish narratives.

Although Joyce composed Ulysses in the years in which this shift was sweeping Irish national culture, his vision resists the nation's newly chosen "purifying" and insular themes. The novel's day-long journey around Dublin presents an idiosyncratic view; one that counters the Jew-baiting of Irish nativists with Bloom's wandering thoughts.

Mystified by his own ambiguous identity, he watches as a typesetter proofs type, thinking: "Reads it backwards first. Quickly he does it. Must require some practice that.... Poor papa with his haggadah book, reading backwards with his finger to me. Pesach. Next year in Jerusalem. Dear, O dear!"

Stiller is nearly 90, so he may have had his share of Bloomsday shenanigans. New Yorkers will fill the gap somehow, and the show will go on in far-flung locales like Trieste, Szombathely, Hungary and Prague. Montrealers will hear of Israel in Erin and try to make meaning from the riverrush of Joycean prose. ■

Historical novel 'sort of' set in Renaissance-era Europe

jserge@thecjn.ca

"Events, destinies, the flow of the river of time…these are altered, often, by very small things." So writes Guy Gavriel Kay, the Winnipeg-based award-winning novelist in his book Children of Earth and Sky which will be published in May.

That sentence is one of the main themes in this historical/fantasy novel set during the Renaissance-era.

Sort of.

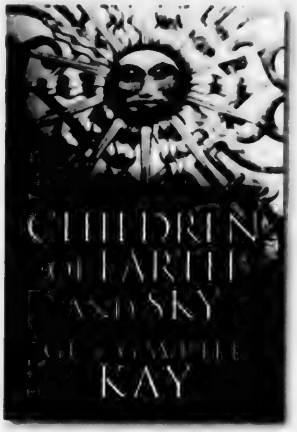
I say "sort of" because while Gavriel Kay grounds this novel in the real world, as he did with his two previous novels set in an alternate history of China, he uses fictitious place names and characters.

Children of Earth and Sky is set in what is obviously the east Mediterranean, shortly after (in real history) the fall of Constantinople and before the Turks set out to siege Vienna.

Except in this novel, the Turks are the Osmanlis, Venice is represented by Seressa and Rome, Rhodias. Drawing from his earliest novels, Gavriel Kay names the three major religions, Jaddites, Asharites and Kindath (Christians, Muslims and Jews, respectively, although their methods of worship are nothing like their real-life counterparts.)

The central plot of this novel is a journey that the three major characters take from Seressa across the Seressini Sea to Dubrava and further east to the fallen Jaddite city of Saratarium, now named Asharias by the conquering Osmanlis.

Pero Villani is a disgraced young artist living in Seressa, a merchant city state that depends heavily on trade. Although talented, Pero's second commission was to paint a contessa. The contessa was a beautiful red-haired woman, much younger than her husband and bored. Inevitably she seduces Pero who reflects her desire for him in his portrait. Found out by her husband, he is disgraced, blackballed and forced to make a living binding books.



Children of Earth and Sky
by Guy Gavriel Kay
Penguin Canada

He is rescued from this plight by the Council of Twelve, the leaders of Seressa, who tell him that the ruler of the Osmanlis, the Grand Khalif, wants a portrait done of himself in the western style. This would be a unique opportunity for the Seressans to study the machinations of the Osmanlis.

No one from the west has ever set foot in Saratarium since it fell, let alone spent time with the Khalif, the enemy of the west.

The mission carries a huge risk, of course. It's unlikely that Pero will ever be allowed to return home, but they promise him that should he return he would be in huge demand as an artist and they would commission him to paint a portrait of the Duke of Seressa himself.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Guy Gavriel Kay

With little to lose, Pero agrees and goes aboard a ship, the Blessed Ignacia, to sail to Dubrova from where he will be escorted with other merchants to Asharias.

He is not the only one travelling on the ship by order of the Council of Twelve. Also aboard is Leonora Valeri. The young noble woman was impregnated by her secret lover. He was found by her elder brother and cut to pieces and left for the wolves. Her father sent her to the Daughters of Jad, a retreat home to spend the rest of her disgraced life there.

The Council of Twelve also rescue her. They are sending a doctor to Dubrava (the Dubravae frequently send such requests to Seressa where the best doctors are often found.) The doctor is an older, single man. They want her to go over to Dubrava as his wife and be their eyes and ears in Dubrava, a competing state they distrust.

She agrees. Like Pero she has nothing to lose.

As it journeys across the Seressini Sea, the ship is boarded by a notorious band of raiders from Senjan, a walled town just north of Dubrava. One of the raiders is Danica Gradek, a brave, young and ambitious woman, talented with a bow and arrow. Her parents were killed by Osmanlis and her younger brother kidnapped by them. Her goal is to be able to avenge this.

Aboard the ship, through circumstance, Danica ends up having to kill a fellow Senjani raider to prevent a bloodbath. Not wanting to return to Senjan, where she will likely be killed, she offers to serve as a bodyguard to the ship's captain. Like the other two, her fate is set.

The first part of this book follows this journey. But soon the tales diverge as they each seek their own paths upon arriving in Dubrava.

Leonara pays a visit to a religious order on an island off Dubrava and gets involved in a plot that includes the island's secret guest, the surviving empress of Saratarium.

Danica comes across a band of notorious guerrilla-style raiders attacking Osmanli supply lines and realizes that her destiny lies with them.

Pero carries on to Saratarium/Asharias and becomes the Khalif's painter but soon becomes embroiled in an intricate power struggle. The choices he makes will have repercussions throughout the world.

And that is the central theme. No matter how insignificant, each person has a role to play in the political chess game of history. Sometimes you do certain things and life is altered, as Danica realizes aboard the Blessed Ignacia. Minor incidents change our fate. Life and death are random.

Sometimes Gavriel Kay repeats certain events from the different points of view of various characters. All this adds to the fluidity of the book and its characters. Life does not have one viewpoint.

A word about the Kindath. Set to represent the Jews, the Kindath don't play a major role in Children. However one of the interesting minor characters we come across is the Khalif's Grand Vizer, Yosef. As Gavriel Kay writes, "Vizers – indeed most high-ranking officials in Asharias – tended to be eunuchs. Sometimes, instead, they were Kindath, followers of a marginal, often-derided faith. The principle was the same: members of neither group could have any hope of achieving something dynastic. They would owe everything, including their continued existence, to the khalif's mercy and grace."

Gavriel Kay is known primarily as a fantasy writer. His novel Ysabel won the World Fantasy Award in 2008. This work is mostly grounded in the real world despite the not-so-subtle geographical name changes.

Yes, there are elements of fantasy. Danica has conversations with her long-dead grandfather, and Pero comes across some magical artifacts in the forest, but these moments are fleeting. While it is fiction, it is set in a real historical period around real events. Do not expect dragons. This is Game of Thrones for adults. ■

The boys of summer are back

HILLEL KUTTLER
JTA

Can the Jays' Kevin Pillar build on his strong 2015 campaign? Will Joc Pederson rebound from his second-half struggles of last season? Will injuries derail one-time MVP Ryan Braun?

These are some of the questions to be answered as these Jewish players and others get set for the Major League Baseball season which began April 3.

Pillar (Toronto Blue Jays), Pederson (Los Angeles Dodgers) and Braun (Milwaukee Brewers) – all outfielders – are among the position players who will start for their teams. They will be joined by second baseman Ian Kinsler of the Detroit Tigers, who also have a Jewish manager, Brad Ausmus. And Danny Valencia, a solid hitter, appears to be the starter at third base for the rebuilding Oakland Athletics.

Among pitchers, right-hander Scott Feldman will be part of the Houston Astros' starting rotation. And the Miami Marlins bullpen will include Craig Breslow, who has mostly made his living for 10 years as a lefty specialist, the last three with Boston. With the Red Sox he earned a World Series championship ring in 2013, then last year achieved a first: he started a game after making 522 appearances in relief.

In Oakland, outfielder Sam Fuld joins Valencia to make the Athletics the only team with multiple Jewish players.

Several others who have played in the majors weren't fortunate enough to make Opening Day rosters. They included infielders Nate Freiman, Ike Davis, Josh Satin and Cody Decker, as well as relief pitcher Josh Zeid.

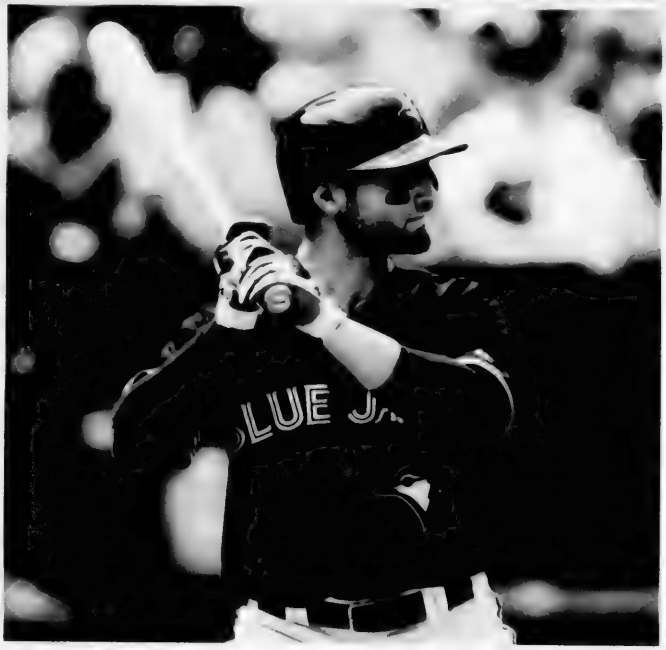
Up-and-comers include shortstop Alex Bregman, the second overall pick in last June's collegiate draft by the Astros, and Zach Borenstein, an outfielder in the Arizona Diamondbacks system. Bregman hit .294 for two of the Astros A teams last season, while Borenstein hit .281 in spring training before being demoted to the minors.

Pederson shouldn't have worries about being sent down, but will look to avoid the second-half doldrums he suffered last season. The centre-fielder had started for the National League in last summer's All-Star game as a rookie one night after finishing second in the home-run-hitting contest. But his horrid second half, which included his benching as the starter, saw his batting average fall to .210 and he finished with a team record-tying 170 strikeouts.

Pillar could be the real deal. He was outstanding in the field, finishing second among all centre-fielders in defensive ratings. While lacking Pederson's power, Pillar showed far better skills as an all-around hitter – so much so that he's been elevated to leadoff in the batting order of one of the majors' best offensive clubs. In 2015, his first full season in the majors, Pillar hit .278, socked 31 doubles and stole 25 bases.

"Pillar is probably the best of them all now" among Jewish major leaguers, Ephraim Moxson, co-publisher of the Jewish Sports Review newsletter said. "He's got a good glove, a good bat and speed."

Braun, a left-fielder starting his 10th season, possesses those tools, too, and remains the brightest light on a rebuilding Brewers team that finished last a season ago in the National League Central. But he's coming back from postseason lower-back surgery that affected him even through spring training.



The Blue Jays' Kevin Pillar

Last year Braun made the All-Star team for the sixth time and is steadily building a Hall of Fame-level career – if his suspension in 2013 for using performance-enhancing drugs can be overlooked.

The Tigers are also looking to return to contention and will need Kinsler to have a typically solid season, as he did in 2015 batting .296, though driving in 19 fewer runs than the previous campaign. A sharp falloff in pitching doomed the Tigers, who finished with the American League's second-worst record and last in the Central Division.

In Houston, Feldman provides veteran leadership to a young staff headlined by Cy Young Award winner Dallas Keuchel. Feldman missed half of 2015 with knee and shoulder injuries, making just 18 starts as the Astros emerged as a wild-card team. Feldman could find himself pitching with much more at stake in October, as the Astros are favoured by some to contend for the World Series this year. Pillar's Blue Jays will provide stiff competition, as Toronto is the consensus pick to reclaim the A.L. East crown. ■

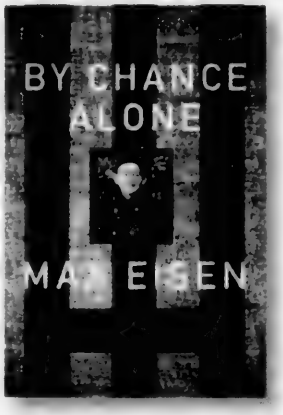
Max Eisen bracingly honest in his Holocaust memoir

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



By Chance Alone
Max Eisen

HarperCollins

All memoirs by Holocaust survivors deserve to be read.

But some are better than others.

And a survivor's memoir that is accepted by a "name" publishing house is almost always excellent.

So it is with Max Eisen, a force of nature in Toronto's Jewish community. Even at age 87, Eisen's memory is a thing to behold. Whether on his rigorous schedule of speaking about his Holocaust experience to school kids, at community events or as a fixture on the annual March of the Living, one can't help but be amazed at his recall, not only of places and dates, but of smells, sounds, tastes, pains – a full palette of sensory impressions, many of them horrible. And he's done it unflinchingly.

He was one of three Canadians who testified last year at the trial of former Auschwitz SS sergeant Oskar Groening, and recently at the trial of Reinhold Henning, a former Auschwitz guard.

It comes as no surprise, then, that Eisen's memoir, By Chance Alone, is a gripping, harrowing read, chock-a-block with pulse-quickening detail.

If there is a trick to this genre, it might be to strike a balance between turning readers off with too much horror, and pulling one's punch with too little. Eisen is bracingly honest in his telling; while not sparing the reader tales of brutality, deprivation, death and gore, he manages to be cool enough to make one want to turn the page.

In his book, the devil really is in the details, which are plentiful and gruesome, and narrated in a way that is impassioned yet measured.

Eisen's story begins in the town of Moldava, Czechoslovakia, and a large, Orthodox family that was content and well-off. The extended clan numbered about 60, many living together in a family compound. The author relates a happy early life, with summers spent on a farm.

The war-era chaos came early when, in March 1939, the eastern part of Czechoslovakia was ceded to Hungary and Hungarian fascists took over, bringing with them "an overt ideology of anti-Semitism," Eisen writes.

By 1940, anti-Jewish edicts banned Jews from owning radios and forbade them from selling alcohol and tobacco, meaning his father was out of work and an income. The next year, all Jewish males between the ages of 18 and 45 – including Eisen's father and uncle– were shipped to forced labour battalions, including Eisen's father and uncle. All members of his mother's family were deported.

The year after that, Eisen, his two brothers, mother and aunt were ordered to pack. After three weeks aboard trucks and trains, the deportation was called off, but the episode served as a taste of things to come.

Jews in Hungarian-speaking regions remained relatively safe until the spring and summer of 1944, when in a span of just eight weeks, some 437,000 of them were deported to Auschwitz, Eisen among them. His descriptions of the three-day cattle-car ride and, on dazed arrival, of blinding floodlights, shouts of "Raus! Schnell!" (Out! Fast!) and prisoners' striped uniforms aren't new but they are no less searing.

There's far worse.

His mother (holding her baby girl), grandparents, aunt and two younger siblings were marched away and gassed. Eisen, his father and uncle were tattooed, given uniforms and taken for slave labour. It happened almost that quickly.

But Eisen does pause for many asides (the barely edible rations, the sickening smell of burning flesh, the dead-eyed prisoners) and to describe one scene readers are not likely to forget. While showering, a young prisoner's glasses slipped off and he got down on the floor to search for them. "A guard came over and kicked him in the side of the head with his jackboot," Eisen writes in an almost matter-of-fact way that so jars with the content. "The young man rolled over and the guard stomped on his chest. I could hear the cracking of ribs. The guard, who was now in a frenzy, continued to stomp on the man until he was dead."

Caught loafing on his work detail one day, Eisen himself was beaten and thrown in a ditch to die with a head injury. Carted back to the camp's hospital (which existed for guards as well as inmates; Eisen explains why), he received surgery, survived and was appointed the operating room's cleaner and all around surgical assistant.

He worked 19 hours a day in relative safety and saw more broken bones, spilled guts, flesh-eating disease and bullet wounds than he ever imagined.

A later task involved removing the gold fillings and crowns from the teeth of the recently gassed. Their owners had been alive just a few moments earlier, Eisen pondered. "And now they were just a pile of ash." He worked there for six months.

The reader is reminded of Miklos Nyiszli's book, Auschwitz: A Doctor's Eyewitness Account.

Eisen also witnessed the hanging in January, 1945 of four young female prisoners who had smuggled gunpowder into the camp in a successful bid to blow up one of the crematoria. He relates how before being executed one at a time, each spoke the final Hebrew words "chazak v'amatz" (be strong and brave).

There followed a death march to two other concentration camps and finally, liberation, but in such ill health, it spawned words no teen should wonder on his birthday. "I turned 16 years old. Would I make it to 17?"

Eisen's postwar meanderings took him through Austria, back to his much-changed hometown, to a battle with wet pleurisy and recovery under the wing of a Jewish organization in a Czech town where he lived for three years; a hair-raising escape from newly-communist Prague, a displaced persons camp, and finally, arrival in Canada in 1949 with images from Jack London novels dancing in his head.

Of about 60 members of his extended family, just Eisen and two cousins survived the war.

There is no shortage of stories from survivors. Make sure, though, that this lucid, chilling one is on your list. ■

Eisen's book will be launched "in conversation" with Heather Reisman, CEO of Indigo, at the Indigo outlet in the Yonge Eglinton Centre on April 19 at 7 p.m.

Along the Pacific Coast Highway

NANCY WIGSTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We've embarked on one of America's iconic drives – the Pacific Coast Highway, winding south from San Francisco to Los Angeles. On the morning of our departure, the sun shines bright and clear. Soon we're cruising the highway, also known as Cal-1, with a few other travellers, and the sights are indeed spectacular.

A word of caution: for the height sensitive, this drive is beautiful and terrifying in equal parts. Our first few hours yield heart-stopping views: sandy brown cliffs high above the Pacific, blue surf crashing onto the rocks below. Way below. The husband-driver loves it, his wife-passenger not so much, despite assurances about the cliff-side guard rail.

An organic farm sign beckons to the east, so we pull in, to sample farm-grown pumpkins made into pie – just delicious. Then it's back on the curving highway, where a friend's daughter once rode her motorbike all the way to Los Angeles. Not nearly so ambitious, we're content with frequent stops to sample seascape panoramas. Reaching the pines of Big Sur country, we pull into Lucia Lodge, an old-fashioned, welcoming place, where the fish tacos are as fresh as the breezes from the Pacific.

After a relaxing night at Cambria Pines Lodge, we double back to the cultural phenomenon known as Hearst Castle. Ever since reading about a Hearst Castle-like creation –"Gothic, medieval, baronial…the nightmare on the hilltop"– in Aldous Huxley's 1939 satire, After Many a Summer, the idea of an art-stuffed castle on the California coast has intrigued us. Huxley ruthlessly skewers a Hearst-like tycoon in what the New York Times called his "Hollywood novel."

Newspaper baron William Randolph Hearst spent himself into near bankruptcy building this monument. It's hard to know where to start when describing this castle – four separate tours cover different aspects of its 156 rooms – so it's best to just dive in, like the Hollywood starlets plunging into the terrace pool in Hearst's home movies from the 1930s.

Here goes: Greek and Roman statuary, Renaissance textiles and tapestries, Oriental carpets, Italian paintings, sculpture upon sculpture – Conova's 18th-century "shy Venus," is now valued at $3,000,000 – a Rubens, Tiffany windows, 3,000 year-old Egyptian goddesses, the largest collection of carved antique ceilings in America, masses of rare books and papers, Greek pottery (800-1500 BCE), a Roman-style indoor pool decorated with more than a million Murano glass tiles, some layered with gold leaf, and the remains of what was once the largest privately owned zoo in the United States. That's just an overview.

Hearst Castle, given to the state by his heirs, remains today the astonishing site that greeted Huxley's scholarly Englishman in the 1930s: an over-the-top testament to manic between-the-wars spending, artfully designed by architect Julia Morgan. Over seven million people a year come to wonder at it. "Wasteful Willie," the sole heir to his father's fortune, was born to shop. "Willie has a mania for antiquities," his mother wrote to her husband, when the boy was just 10 years old. Neither modern works nor landscapes ever interested him.

The feeling of strolling through movie sets of vanished worlds permeates the castle – after all, that's Alex Trebek's voice narrating the Hearst story on the bus from the parking lot. Strongly drawn to Hollywood through his long-time romantic partner, actress Marion Davies, Hearst's guests included stars like Cary Grant – then married to heiress Barbara Hutton – who were flown up to what the older man called his "ranch." Far from louche Hollywood, guests were encouraged to drink little and exercise much. No golf was played – Hearst considered golf a game for "sick old men" – but horseback riding, swimming and tennis were all on the menu. Grant joked that one riding session was so long that they almost made it back to Los Angeles. In addition to Hollywood stars, Hearst hosted political luminaries like Winston Churchill and a young John F. Kennedy.

"We've been lucky," says our guide, touching on the delicate subject of the return of stolen art. Only three Hearst paintings have been identified as Nazi loot, and have been returned to the Oppenheimer family after a lawsuit was brought by the heirs. "Hoarder" and "shopaholic" are used by castle guides to describe the man who once owned 26 newspapers, 18 magazines, eight radio stations, two movie studios, nearly 100 businesses, multiple homes, and five warehouses "crammed full" of his purchases.

As if anticipating criticism, our guide stresses that Hearst "was not pillaging Europe, Europe was pillaging itself" – a statement that would surely have piqued the interest of Aldous Huxley, among others. Huxley's 1930s satire contrasts the ragged, fruit-picking "transients" from dust bowl Kansas with the lavish opulence on the hill.

Often reviled in his time for his sensational practice of "yellow journalism" and his dubious "populist" politics, Hearst has become notorious as a model for the character that Orson Welles called Citizen Kane. Perhaps the greatest American movie ever made, the 1941 film was never reviewed in a single Hearst newspaper. Despite having to sell many objects to pay his debts, Hearst left behind enough things to qualify his castle as a museum, "the only thing like this on the coast" between San Francisco and L.A.

Hearst had wanted a museum here, but after his death, UC Berkeley turned down the idea, and, our guide tells us, the castle "almost became a bed and breakfast." Then his sons by his first marriage gave the castle to the state, protecting the land from development. The first tours began in 1968. The family runs the ranch still, raising grass-fed cattle on its 97,000 hectares.

Exiting the grounds, we see another weird sight. A herd of zebras are grazing on the vast green hillside, the wild offspring of Hearst's zoo. More wildlife draws crowds on a nearby beach – these are the strange, gigantic creatures known as elephant seals. The females, having given birth to their young, laze about on the sand, while the males occasionally rise up and trumpet at one another –it's as entrancing a scene as any we've seen thus far, another wild and unusual pleasure offered by driving California's Pacific Coast. ■

Breaking news: Celebrities achieve peace in the Middle East

David Levine

Peace has finally arrived in the Holy Land.

After weeks of marathon negotiations and unprecedented concessions from both sides, a bipartisan consortium of international celebrities has succeeded in brokering a historic peace treaty that has been embraced by Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

"This is a crucial accord, unrivalled in complexity, outstanding in both scope and nuance," said Roger Waters, former lead singer of Pink Floyd and chief negotiator on the issues of taxation and marine rights.

"I could not be more proud of my colleagues on both sides of the table."

Even before Palestinians and Israelis began the process of implementing the recommendations of the accords – destroying arms and expanding bilateral infrastructure – celebrations had erupted on the streets of Jerusalem and Ramallah and throngs of ecstatic citizens have come together in song and dance.

Tamar, an 84-year-old Israeli grandmother, wipes a tear from her eye. She says she has lost too many friends and relatives to a cycle of violence that she feared was endless:

"So many generations have dreamt of this moment, prayed for this moment. All who have worked for peace and all who will live in its bounty owe an eternal debt to One Direction's Zayn Malik."

Although celebrities have long been considered the world's leading experts on the Israel/Palestine conflict (as evidenced by their substantive tweets), many were skeptical that they would succeed where so many scholars and governments had failed, despite being steeped in the history and minutiae of the issues - but the unbounded joy that can be felt across the land today is a testament to the group's dedication and diplomatic skill.

"Everyone has been making (peace) seem so hard to achieve," said Penelope Cruz, spokesperson and star of Zoolander 2. "If you want it bad enough, anything is possible."

"I don't know why we didn't do this years ago."

"People were quick to discount our intellect, our ability to negotiate," agrees radio pioneer Howard Stern, "but it's important to understand that we surpass regular human beings in every possible way."

The eyes of the world were fixated on the secretive negotiations - which got off to a shaky start, after sources reported both sides were threatening to walk out over basic ideological schisms ranging from the lunch menu to the available brands of bottled water. Once these issues were addressed, however, the collective experience and education of the negotiators propelled the treaty forward:

A working group led by Roseanne Barr, star of She-Devil, and FIFA world player of the year Cristiano Ronaldo presented an elegant (and universally approved) solution to the issue of Palestinian statehood; Nanny McPhee star Emma Thompson and ur-Jerseyan rocker Jon Bon Jovi co-authored a white paper outlining a comprehensive framework and action plan addressing issues of settlement and occupation; using the Internet, Clueless actress Stacey Dash and Disney property Selena Gomez were able to resolve the right of return in under 90 minutes.

After signing the accord, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas embraced openly, calling the moment "the end of history, and the dawn of a new day."

World leaders from America to Iran have expressed their unqualified support for the so-called Planet Hollywood Accords. Political observers have been quick to praise the plan's intricacies.

"This agreement and the solutions it outlines are nothing short of genius," said Henry Kissinger.

"In a lifetime of diplomatic efforts, I have not seen their equal. I wish to convey my most sincere appreciation and admiration to Javier Bardem, Jon Voigt, and all these dedicated celebrity diplomats. You have quite literally changed the world today."

Among the ephemera of the moment, a newly formed artist's collective, made up of Hamas leaders and IDF soldiers, has already started work on a statue, a lasting monument to peace in their time, to stand at the gates of Jerusalem's Old City. Entitled Visionaries the work will depict Vanessa Redgrave and Joan Rivers, embracing atop a red carpet. ■

Hip hop: It's not just for teens anymore

Artists participate in Jerusalem for 30 Under 30 Summit

JESSICA STEINBERG
JERUSALEM

Arab rapper SAZ

London-based star Little Simz

Hip hop, that rhythmic, rhyming speech pattern that has become one of the most popular music forms worldwide, provided a way of life for the three musicians sitting under the hot Jerusalem morning sun on a recent April morning.

The three artists, British star Little Simz, Okieriete Onaodowan from the hit Broadway musical Hamilton and Arab rapper SAZ, were on hand at the Forbes 30 Under 30 Summit EMEA (Europe, the Middle East and Africa). The summit is part of the Forbes magazine annual 30 Under 30 events, that brought together 600 young entrepreneurs from the United States, Europe, the Middle East and Africa for five days of collaboration and exposure to Israel last week.

"Three-quarters of the people here have never been in Israel before, so for them to come to a summit and experience this entrepreneurial place adds to the experience," said Randall Lane, editor of Forbes magazine.

The 30 Under 30 participants were sprawled on bean bags and pillows in Jerusalem's Israel Museum sculpture garden. Onstage, next to the iconic Robert Indiana Ahava/Love sculpture, the three artists – moderated by Forbes senior editor Zack O'Malley Greenburg – talked about the genre of hip hop, and how each of them became inspired by it at different points in their lives.

Hip hop, pointed out Greenburg, is having its global moment in the mainstream, given its exposure in Broadway hits like Hamilton, in which playwright Lin-Manuel Miranda tells the story of American revolutionary Alexander Hamilton in rap form; television show Empire about the hip-hop industry; and the 2015 film Straight Outta Compton, depicting life in southern Los Angeles, where the genre was created.

Oak, as Onaodowan calls himself, said he discovered hip hop on his own as a young teen. His family is Nigerian and while he was raised in the United States, his family's culture was more influenced by their native land than American culture.

"I discovered things myself," said Onaodowan. "I just loved listening to hip hop, I love the words. The angry words resonated with me."

In Hamilton, which has grossed $61.7 million (US) since moving to Broadway from Off Broadway last July, Onaodowan plays the roles of president James Madison and Hercules Mulligan, a tailor who spied on the British.

Little Simz, a North London hip-hop artist who self-released her critically acclaimed debut album A Curious Tale of Trials + Persons – named one of the best albums of 2015 by Vogue – said she first heard hip hop when she was around nine years old. She's now 22.

"I was listening to [hip hop artists] Missy Elliot and Ludacris, and what drew me to it was the visual," she said. "As I got older, I got more into the concept of it and the storytelling and what people actually had to say."

Lauryn Hill, said Little Simz, referring to the former lead singer of The Fugees, was an early influence, quoting Hill's line from her song Lost Ones: "It's funny how money change a situation/Miscommunication leads to complication."

"That will never get old for me, there's so much truth in that bar, right there," she said.

SAZ, who was raised in Ramla, a mixed city of Arabs and Jews, said he hadn't heard of hip hop until he began doing a freestyle kind of rap as a young kid, and was sent some discs by his cousins who lived abroad.

For all three artists, hip hop resonated as a musical form for people who felt they didn't have a voice.

"As long as there are those paradigms, people will gravitate to the music," said Onaodowan. "The beats are just primal, if you think of banging on the drum, it's almost like a war cry."

The genre also operates as an entire culture, pointed out Little Simz.

"There's dancing, DJing, there's so much that kind of fits under the umbrella of hip hop," she said. "Hip hop was the only thing I was good at and felt I could be 100 per cent me and be expressive. Another 22-year-old can hear what I'm going through and connect to it and relate to it."

SAZ felt the same way when he first heard hip hop, he said. There was an instant connection with the words and meanings, despite the fact that he was an Arab from Ramla and the artists he was listening to were African-Americans living in the United States.

"I felt a lot of similarity and more in common with black people than I do with Israelis who live around the corner from me," said SAZ. "I got beaten by the police when I was 14. When I heard what [hip hop artist] Tupac said, to take this misunderstanding happening in my life, so hip hop for me was a place where I can express myself and take this rage to help change my life."

The Ramla rapper currently tours in Israel and around the world, and was a celebrity contestant in the 2012 second season of Chai be La La Land, an Israeli reality show about singers hoping to achieve that near-mythical dream of celebrity success.

He wasn't the only Arab gaining strength from the rhythms of hip hop. Tupac Shakur, the famed rapper who was killed in a drive-by shooting in 1996, is famous in the Palestinian world, said SAZ, and "every second home has a CD of Tupac because even if they don't understand English, they understand the meaning and the vibe."

The speech of hip hop, said Onaodowan, is the essence of the genre, and therefore is accessible to anyone who can speak.

"It's just speaking, something you do every day," he said.

"With Hamilton, what's cool about the show is that even super-old white people come to see the show and hang on every word, it's that good," said Onaodowan, "and I'm like, 'it's just talking, it's hip hop,' and you just have to find the right things to say and be willing to listen. They were willing to listen to what we were saying."

The success of Hamilton demonstrates that it needs to be multiplied in order to create more roles for people of colour, producing "more versions of us being seen," he said.

Hip hop, said SAZ, offered him a way of dealing with the conflict that forms the backbone of his life.

"As an artist, I prefer to be the bridge rather than the bomb," he said. "There's been too much bloodshed since 1948. I live in both worlds. I live in the West Bank and here, so for me, I'm part of the conflict and culture took away the bad vibes and the hating. I'm showing love because as a Palestinian, we don't have any solutions in life. The true image isn't really out there so I'm sending a new image. We want to change and are part of the change."

"For me," he continued, "performing is part of my struggle. I'm not doing it to get money, I'm struggling."

The three artists were joined by several others April 6 at the Tower of David Museum in Jerusalem, where Forbes 30 Under 30 hosted a live musical performance synced to virtual reality, in which all attendees of the concert wore virtual reality headsets and enjoyed a simultaneous virtual reality experience during the concert. ■

Sarah Fulford and Naomi Zener talk media and women

jshupac@thecjn.ca

On April 4, Genesis, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Innovation, hosted a panel discussion featuring Toronto Life editor Sarah Fulford, and Naomi Zener, a lawyer and vice-president of business and legal affairs for Vice Media, Inc. in Canada. Zener is also a published novelist and the writer of a satire fiction blog, SatiricalMama.com.

The panel was held at the Design Exchange.

The CJN spoke to Zener before the event on April 4 and to Fulford after the event.

MICHAEL GELMAN PHOTOGRAPHY

Why do you think Genesis, UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Innovation asked you to appear on this panel?

Fulford: I think you'd have to ask UJA Genesis! But I'm certainly glad they did. I'd never met Naomi before, and now we're friends. That's a surprise gift. Plus, I met a dozen or so other great women that night.

Zener: I work at an international youth media company that has a variety of channels. We're the pre-eminent brand for millennials who are looking for news, lifestyle, information and entertainment. Because we started in traditional media, then exploded as a digital company and are now exploring and exploding traditional avenues of distribution, people look at us as an innovative company to watch.

What will be/what was the focus of the talk?

Fulford: It was wonderfully unfocused. We covered a ton of territory: the digital revolution in media, balancing family life with work life, and what it means to be Jewish in 2016. It was really fun.

Zener: I think it'll be about how Sarah and I have gotten where we are in our careers to date – not just as individuals but as women – and about how we balance our lives as executives, spouses, parents etc., and also find ways to pursue our passions in our spare time. I think we'll give advice, based on the experiences we've had, to people early in their careers, mid-career or people who are looking to switch careers.

What sort of things does your job entail?

Fulford: As editor of Toronto Life, it's my job to ensure that the magazine and its website resonate with readers. I work with writers and editor colleagues to identify stories we think are relevant and compelling. Then we do our best to bring them to life in the most engaging way possible, with great storytelling and powerful images. It's pretty terrific, actually. There's something magical about working with smart, creative people all day long.

Zener: I manage all business and legal affairs matters for Vice in Canada. I deal with all legal or business affairs issues that arise and help with strategic planning and growth initiatives for our television, film and digital content production, advertising, our creative services division, sales and branded content. I work with our joint-venture partners and advise on a bevy of matters, from labour and employment to broadcast and regulatory matters. My days are quite varied.

How has your publication managed to stay relevant in a challenging and quickly evolving media landscape?

Fulford: Funny you should ask! This fall, Toronto Life will celebrate its 50th anniversary. Over the last few months, I've been spending time in the magazine's archives, and I've seen that certain core elements of Toronto Life haven't changed: the magazine has been covering restaurants, real estate, politics, culture and society for five decades. It has deliberately played a role in creating the city's self-image and self-understanding. But the city itself has changed so much. It's become so much more sophisticated and complicated – our stories reflect that.

As for the changing media landscape, we believe that people want excellent editorial content now just as much as in the past. People just want it on a variety of platforms – in print, on their phones, tablets and desktop computers. Our award-winning long-form journalism is just as popular online as it is in print, and sometimes more so, because people share our stories on social media, so we regularly reach people outside our core print subscription demographic. That's a real joy. The digital space has also allowed Toronto Life to be a lot more than a monthly print magazine. We publish many stories on our website each day on a variety of subjects and a variety of formats.

Zener: I'm not working on the creative or editorial side, but I can say we have a very raw, immersive approach to telling stories, and we tell stories that are under-represented. We do so honestly, and I think our audience appreciates that.

Are there particular challenges that you've experienced as a woman in charge of a large operation (or in charge of part of an operation)?

Fulford: I was appointed editor of Toronto Life in 2007, and at first, I was worried I wasn't going to be taken seriously because I was just 33 years old and a woman. I was following in the footsteps of a widely admired, firmly established, veteran male editor. Then I took over in 2008, right around the time the Great Recession hit, and my Number 1 challenge was dealing with a massive decline in advertising revenue. I spent my first few years on the job looking at spreadsheets, trying to figure out how to maintain quality while reducing expenses. It was a trial by fire, and it totally eclipsed any issues around my age or gender.

Zener: I think being a woman in any workplace means having unique challenges that have been widely discussed, and remain true, by public figures such as Sheryl Sandberg and Anne-Marie Slaughter. From my perspective personally, I think being a woman and a mother lets me bring to the table a whole set of skills that a man wouldn't necessarily be able to bring. Simply having to juggle a busy career and motherhood is a unique challenge that many women in the workforce face and have to find a way to navigate.

Would you say your writing or editing is in any way driven by a feminist perspective?

Fulford: That's really hard for me to judge. It's possible I'm more curious about stories by and about women than some male editors, but of course, Toronto Life is a general interest magazine, so we curate our stories to reach both men and women.

Zener: I see myself as a feminist, and I believe in intersectional feminism. I think we have to look at feminism from a global, wholesale perspective. The satire and short fiction on my blog can be inspired by anything. It's not strictly from a feminist perspective. It could be anything from, for example, a legal decision to something going on in the world to my husband saying something completely ridiculous – any of these things can inspire me to write abut something or satirize it.

How does your Jewishness factor into your work as a journalist or a writer, if at all?

Fulford: I wouldn't say it plays a direct role in my work. However, there is something powerful about belonging to a group of people with a long history, and being aware of that history. Especially in a city like Toronto, where there are people from all over the world, it's important to know we all have roots that go deep, and that worldviews are informed by generations.

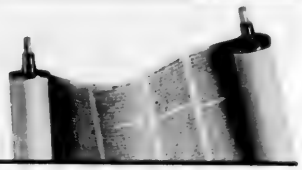
Zener: I think my humour comes from a very Jewish place – from the family I was raised in, from my grandmothers, who had the immigrant Jewish experience and this very unique way of speaking. My maternal grandmother, especially, never lost her sense of humour, despite surviving the Holocaust.

Those unique immigration stories and the approach to telling them have helped mould how I view things, and I think that comes out in my writing. It's a certain bluntness. There's no sugar coating. ■

These interviews have been edited and condensed for style and clarity.

Parshah

Metzora | Leviticus 14:1-15:33



Rabbi Aaron Katchen evaluates Elijah, one of Judaism's most complex figures
Rabbi Michal Shekel considers the dangers of languishing in a mindset of slavery
Rabbi Howard Morrison explains why the Haggadah is the textbook of Jewish values

Aaron Katchen

"Lo, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and awesome day of the Lord" (Malachi 3:23).

Shabbat HaGadol is the Shabbat that precedes Pesach. Historically it was one of two times a year that the community rabbi or rosh yeshiva (head of academy) gave a major sermon. Although today many rabbis speak often, we have maintained the custom in many communities for the rabbi to give a longer, more elaborate sermon on this Shabbat. Lo, The CJN does not afford me this privilege.

My youngest son had his brit milah the week of Shabbat HaGadol, and his name comes from the Haftorah read on Shabbat HaGadol. The Haftorah comes from the last chapter of the last book of the Prophets, Malachi, Chapter 3. The last two verses of Malachi talk about the return of Elijah the prophet, preceding the messianic era. Normally Elijah is referred to in Hebrew as Eliyahu, but here he is called Eliya.

Elijah is a complex figure. He is known and (mostly) exalted for being zealous for God – kanai l'HaShem. His zealotry was intended to return the Jewish People to worship God. Unfortunately, it was met with mixed results, and many people couldn't handle his zeal. He ultimately could not complete his mission through zealotry.

Eliyahu was a kanai, a zealot, but our verse is speaking of Eliya, the mevaser – announcer of the Mashiach. Here the medium is the message. Zealotry is not a bad thing when directed inward, but most people have trouble responding when it is directed externally.

Instead of being a zealot, Eliya(hu) now joins with us at the times close to redemption: at a brit milah, at Havdalah, and at our Pesach seder. By focusing his message on the positive and aspirational "awesome day of the Lord," Eliya will succeed where Eliyahu could not. ■

The psalmist wrote: "Purge me with hyssop till I am pure." (Psalms, 51:9) This humble plant was a crucial item in the purification rites. In this week's parshah, hyssop is used to purify the metsora, the person with a particular skin affliction that is often translated as leprosy.

Hyssop plays an important role in another ritual. When our ancestors in Egypt were commanded to paint their doorposts in blood, the "brush" they used was hyssop.

According to Ibn Ezra (Exodus, 12:22) hyssop is called za'atar by the Arabs and oregano in a "foreign language." He goes on to ponder why the hyssop is paired with the cedar in the purification rite for the metsora, pointing out that the cedar is among the largest of trees while the hyssop is the smallest of plants.

The answer may be found in Midrash Shmot Rabbah, which teaches that in God's eyes, the great (cedar) and the small (hyssop) are equal. Both the metsora and our ancestors saw themselves as lowly beings, whether because of who they were or because of what they did. As God's redemption elevated us when we left Egypt, so too, the priestly ritual welcoming the metsora back into the community symbolizes the potential of the individual. While we may see ourselves as the hyssop, the Divine sees the shoot of a cedar.

The symbols surrounding the approaching holiday of Pesach are imbued with humility: matzah is the simple bread of poverty, the lowly hyssop dipped in blood marked the doors of the Israelite slaves. These are reminders of our past, our humble roots. The danger is that we could languish in the spiritual mindset of that slavery.

Perhaps a little za'atar on our matzah this year may remind us of the redemptive Divine potential that sprouts within us all. ■

Shabbat HaGadol, the Great Sabbath, is the special designation for the Shabbat prior to Pesach for many reasons. In talmudic literature, a gadol refers to one who is considered adult and is obligated to observe mitzvot. Shabbat HaGadol suggests that at this season of the year, the Israelites became adult as a nation and now assumed the obligations concerning the mitzvot associated with celebrating Pesach. The word gadol appears in the special Haftorah of the day. We read that the great and awesome day of the Lord will come when the heart of the parents is restored to the children, and the heart of the children is restored to the parents. At this season of the year, we are advised to lessen the gap between the generations.

How appropriate a message this is, given that many of us will be seated around a multi-generational seder table just a few days later. Some have suggested that the special name of the day instead be "Shabbat Haggadah," referring to the practice that on the Sabbath prior to Pesach, it's customary to study the Haggadah in advance of the festival. This opinion makes a lot of sense. To merely read through the Haggadah at the seder without sufficient preparation could have little constructive impact for those attending. Conversely, to carefully study the Haggadah in advance could help the leaders of the night establish meaningful goals for the variety of ages and backgrounds that will attend.

While many of us will spend considerable time preparing for all kinds of details associated with Pesach, the designation of Shabbat HaGadol reminds us to reflect on our personal Jewish obligations, to unite the generations, and to treat the Haggadah as a central textbook of Jewish values, which are always relevant and which need to be refreshed from year to year. ■

The Belleville Jew and Orangeman

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE

Oh ladies and gentlemen,
While I've nothing to do,
I'll just sing a song
About the Belleville Jew.

— Dr. John Barker, Kingston British Whig, April 1836

The acclaimed 19th century Canadian author Susanna Moodie is best remembered for her popular account of the trials and tribulations of pioneer life in Upper Canada, most notably in her classic book Roughing It in the Bush published in London in 1852. Moodie had a keen eye for details. She was intelligent, progressive and fought against slavery. But she also had a bad temper, especially when she believed someone had wronged her husband, Sheriff J.W. Dunbar Moodie of Belleville, Ont.

In 1843, she sought her revenge against George Benjamin, the British-born and Jewish publisher and editor of the weekly Belleville Intelligencer, who had harshly criticized Dunbar's alleged bias as a returning officer in a United Province of Canada election. The sheriff subsequently lost his job as the returning officer and the Moodies, rightly or wrongly, blamed Benjamin. Moodie wrote a four-part story for the Literary Garland, a popular magazine published in Montreal, entitled Richard Redpath: A Tale.

In her story, which partly takes place in Jamaica, there is a Shylock-like character named Benjamin Levi, "the Jew editor" of the Jamaica Observer. There was little attempt to disguise the blatantly anti-Semitic portrait of George Benjamin as Levi, as Moodie readily admitted in her correspondence.

Benjamin was one of the more peculiar individuals in Canadian Jewish history. As his biographers, Sheldon and Judith Godfrey, relate, Benjamin's real claim to fame was his career as a municipal and provincial politician. In 1836, he won election as a clerk of the Thurlow Township, and thus was the first Jew elected to a municipal office in pre-Confederation Canada. This was one of many municipal posts he held over the years. Two decades later, in 1856, he was elected to the Province of Canada's assembly and again had "made history," as the Godfreys put it. "Benjamin was the first Jew to be elected to the Canadian parliament," they write. "He was the first Jew whose right to be seated in a British North American legislature was not contested."

But the curious thing about Benjamin was that he spent his entire adult life shunning and hiding his Jewish roots, living as a Christian. Benjamin was also likely the only known Jew to become a grandmaster of the Orange Lodge, the Protestant organization highly critical of Roman Catholicism. And yet, one of his most cherished possessions was a Hebrew prayer book in which he kept a record of his life and the births of his children.

Benjamin was born in 1799 in Brighton, England, as Moses Cohen to a family with Sephardi ancestry. Believing that being a Jew was an obstacle to success, he initially changed his name to George Benjamin (taking his mother's maiden name.) In his new guise, he immigrated to the United States and lived for a time in North Carolina, where in 1832 at the age of 33 he met and married Isabella Jacobs, a Jewish girl who was a few months shy of her 13th birthday, a young bride even for those days. They had 14 children, 12 of whom survived to adulthood. They arrived in Toronto in 1834 and then soon moved to Belleville.

While Benjamin did not advertise that he was Jewish, his critics and political opponents, like John Barker, the editor and publisher of the Kingston British Whig, a Reform newspaper, did not hesitate to bring up the fact.

Benjamin's political career ended in 1863 when he opted not to stand for re-election. By then, most of his children had been baptized. Nine months before he died in September 1864, and to ensure that he and Isabella would be buried in Belleville's St. Thomas' Anglican Church cemetery, the two were also baptized. Other Jewish politicians of this era did not feel the need to go to such extremes. Yet George Benjamin, who had willingly shed his identity as Moses Cohen, was not the last Jew to perceive that being Jewish was a liability to success. ■

Harper advises Jewish Republicans, and a Panama Papers painting

Alive and well in Las Vegas

The suddenly reclusive Stephen Harper turned up in Las Vegas to advise U.S. right-wingers on how to unite fractious parties. The defeated Conservative prime minister spoke at a private dinner April 7 hosted by billionaire Sheldon Adelson at his Venetian Hotel, as part of the Republican Jewish Coalition's spring meetings, Politico reported. Harper's spokesperson said his talk demonstrated his continued support for Israel. "He was not paid to attend the event and was not paid to speak," she told Huffington Post.

Artwork held in Geneva

An alleged Nazi-looted painting by Jewish artist Amedeo Modigliani was seized in a criminal investigation in Geneva, earlier this month. Ownership of the 1918 work, Seated Man with a Cane, was disclosed as part of the leak of the Panama Papers, the 11.5 million documents from Panama law firm Mossack Fonseca related to off-shore accounts that's causing scandals worldwide. The painting was revealed to be owned by Jewish art dealer David Nahmad through his International Art Center (IAC), a firm set up by Mossack Fonseca that bought the work in 1996. It's worth up to $25 million(U.S.).

Modigliani's Seated Man With a Cane

The Nahmad family had denied owning the painting, which was stolen from art dealer Oscar Stettiner, who fled Paris in 1938. The Nahmad family now says the IAC bought it in good faith and there's no proof Stettiner ever owned it. The Nazis auctioned the painting in 1944. Stettiner filed a claim to it in 1946, but died in 1948 before recouping it. A grandson has been trying to recover it in the U.S. courts. He hired Mondex, a Toronto art recovery firm, to find it in 2011.

Maybe if you listen very hard...

A California judge ruled this month that a trial will be needed to see if Led Zeppelin stole the opening notes for its 1971 classic Stairway to Heaven from the mid-'60s song Taurus by late Jewish guitarist Randy Wolfe, who fronted the band Spirit. Wolfe's estate argues Led Zeppelin's Jimmy Page and Robert Plant heard Taurus when the bands played at some of the same festivals in the 1960s. The trial is slated to start May 10. ■

Gaza doctor replies

I just read the article, "Rights museum criticized for featuring Palestinian doctor," (April 14):

It was sad to see an academic judge without knowing and that The CJN gave him a stage. I expect The CJN to spread tolerance, truth, kindness and wisdom. There is enough hatred and suffering for all.

I would like to invite Haskel Greenfield to attend my lecture and have a sincere and authentic dialogue about what can be done to have Palestinians and Israelis living together as equal citizens and being free in independent states.

Talking about the elephant

It's so nice to see Canadian Jewish and Muslim women engaging with each other in such a friendly, non-threatening way ("The state of Jewish-Muslim dialogue in Canada," April 14). If only women in, say, Israel and Palestine could take a page from this group and involve themselves in creative movement and discussions about empowerment, there could finally be a true and lasting peace.

Just kidding, of course. In the real world of the Middle East, Israel must continually assert its right to exist in the face of Arab/Muslim rejectionism, a state of affairs that has its origin in Islam's sacred texts, which record the prophet Muhammad's "Jewish problem."

I have no objection to Barbara Landau and her group shmoozing like crazy and dancing up a storm. I do, however, object to the idea that it will lead to anything of value in the larger scheme. How could it when everyone is deftly avoiding the ever-present elephant in the room: the Jews' sovereignty over their ancient, ancestral homeland and the Islamic belief that once a land has been conquered for Allah, there's no going back?

The courage of Rabbi Cardozo

As co-ordinators of the David Cardozo Academy Think Tank in Jerusalem, we know Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo well, though we do not agree with all of his views (such disagreement is something he himself encourages). We are some of the people who "relieve Rabbi Cardozo's religious loneliness," as Rabbi Dow Marmur wrote, ("A timid hero," April 7).

While we appreciated Rabbi Marmur's call against isolationism and for uniting to take action, in Rabbi Cardozo's case, throwing in his lot with the progressive movements would be inauthentic to his beliefs and undermine his goals. Rabbi Cardozo's commitment to Halachah is total and traditional in a way that other movements, even perhaps the Conservative movement's, are not. This remains a fundamental and unbridgeable difference, even when he pushes for changes in Halachah. Though he is absolutely willing to learn from all denominations (and religions) in order to create a more humane, moral and authentically Jewish Halachah, joining forces with people who reject the Orthodox community's mechanisms for halachic change does not accomplish his stated goals.

Rabbi Marmur claims that Orthodoxy is not for Rabbi Cardozo. But since Rabbi Cardozo is trying to wrest Halachah away from those responsible for its stagnation, who are undoubtedly Orthodox Jews, his message must in large measure be aimed at these groups. In his view, the only way to wrest a stagnated Orthodoxy away from the Orthodox in order to rejuvenate it and return it to its authentic state is by disturbing it from within, broadcasting to those willing to listen and to whom the message is relevant. It is not Rabbi Marmur's congregants (we assume) who end up having to recite by rote prayers hundreds of years old, for fear of tinkering with established liturgy, or who struggle with the laws around drinking wine poured by a non-Jew!

Rabbi Cardozo's mission is to provide a bold voice calling for Orthodox Judaism to become the most elevated, thrilling and noble path that it can be. He consistently points to aspects that are based on fear and diasporic thinking and will not let us rest in our comfortable, routine Orthodox lives, calling us to think more, do more, and be more.

In light of Rabbi Cardozo's willingness to stand his ground, at personal cost, Rabbi Marmur's musings about his "timidity" and "insecurity" astonished us.

RABBI-2-RABBI

What does liberation mean?

Reading our individual and collective cries for leadership into the Passover story can help us move toward our own 'land of freedom'

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: Liberation. It's such a loaded term.

On Pesach, we read in the Haggadah that "had God not taken our ancestors out of Egypt, then we, our children, and our children's children would still be enslaved to Pharaoh in Egypt." It's a bold claim. But I instinctively feel that it's not meant to be taken literally.

Rather, we are being taught that there is a kind of slavery that consists of an emotional and spiritual state. This cognitive prison is what we were once redeemed from. The lesson is that if we were given the spiritual and emotional ability to be freed from slavery before, then each of us has it within our abilities to be freed from what holds us back today as well.

Rabbi Splansky: Your comment reminds me of the relationship between the Wise Child and the Simple Child. The Wise One asks: "What is the meaning of the laws, statutes and rules which God has commanded?" The Simple One asks: "What is this about?" Most Haggadahs answer the Wise with details of Halachah and the Simple with talk of miracles and wonder.

But in the Jerusalem Talmud, Rabbi Chiya suggests just the opposite. The Wise One demonstrates an ability for critical thinking, so Rabbi Chiya wants to awaken her capacity for spiritual pursuits. He redirects her to behold the miracle – "the mighty hand" of The Eternal God who brought us out of Egypt. By contrast, the Simple One is naturally open to God's presence in the world, so Rabbi Chiya cultivates in him an intellectual approach, instructing him in the laws of Pesach.

The message is that both mind and spirit are required for any act of liberation.

Rabbi Fishman: My constant hope with all Jewish texts is that those learning them can pause for long enough to actually internalize them. So often I see people breezing through learning a Jewish topic and approaching it intellectually. Yet Pesach is the season where we are enjoined to experientially live through these lessons. My picture of a successful seder is one in which those around the table pause and ask themselves real and difficult questions.

Slavery and liberation are such powerful themes, because they apply to each one of us. The question that always needs to be asked, therefore, is: how does this affect me? How might the story of Passover help each of us move forward towards our own "land of freedom"?

Rabbi Splansky: That is the very definition of the Rebellious Child. Stubborn, stuck in his own narrow identity, the Rebellious One does not have faith in his own ability to advance into the wilderness. Because he needs control, he limits himself and his capacity to grow.

That is what it means when the Hagaddah sternly warns: "Had he been there, he would not have been redeemed." It's a kind of spiritual immaturity that keeps the rebel in chains. The only way to soften the lines he draws between "me singular" and "you plural" is to love him even more.

Rabbi Fishman: Perhaps the most powerful observation about the Exodus is that the Jewish People were not ready to leave Egypt. In fact they needed a pushy outsider, Moses, to prod them toward their destination.

I think the Exodus story of liberation is teaching us that in our own lives, we all need a Moses figure who can push and pull and prompt us to move ahead. In a sense, the question at this time is less "Can I emerge from my sense of being stuck?" and more, "Who can guide me to the next stage of the journey?"

If we can have the courage to confront these question, then I believe we will have a successful Pesach.

Rabbi Splansky: The world is indeed desperate for good leadership. But even before Moses enters the scene as our leading man, the people show initiative. The trigger for the Exodus was the people's cry.

In 400 years of slavery, we did not cry out to God for help. Our liberation begins with that cry. The people were finally united in their suffering – ready, willing and able to be redeemed from it. The collective cry is the pivot point in our story, the invitation for leadership, both human and Divine, to emerge. ■

Several astute readers called The CJN offices last week to comment on the seder picture we published April 14. (pictured here again above). Originally we stated it was taken at a Prince Rupert, B.C., seder for servicemen in 1943. In fact, it turns out it's actually from the second seder for Royal Canadian Air Force personnel, held at Isow's restaurant in London, England, in 1945. Canadian Chaplain Rabbi Jacob Eisen officiated. The CJN regrets the error and thanks our readers for setting us straight.

Meanwhile, pictured below is (we hope) the picture from the Prince Rupert army base, circa 1943, that we alluded to last week.

A Pesach miracle

The day before Pesach is always a race against time. Meals need to be prepared, chametz must be disposed of, tables require setting, and someone has to screw up the courage to grate the maror. By seder time, everyone is feeling exhausted, and yet exhilarated. It's the same story every year – or at least it was for me, until last year.

On the day before Pesach last year, my wife and I packed up our daughter and our dog and shipped them off to my parents' house, where we were planning to spend the holiday for the first time since we'd started dating. In the intervening years, we had always attended seders on the screened-in porch of my wife's grandmother's farm in Niagara, kept warm and cozy by a wood-burning stove (and four glasses of wine). Last year, though, we knew we would have to stay in Toronto.

I finished cleaning up at home, burned the remaining chametz on the barbecue out back and locked up. My wife was already in the car with one final piece of luggage. But we weren't headed to join the festivities at my parents' place. There was the small matter of welcoming our second child to attend to first.

We checked in at the hospital, where they confirmed that today was to be the day – just not yet. So, we drove to a trendy nearby neighbourhood, and, as a cold rain fell, walked up and down the streets, ducking into stores aimlessly. We were both trying to keep the mood light, laughing at the sheer ridiculousness of the situation. Then the hospital called. It was time.

Our son was born minutes before the onset of Pesach. The three of us – my wife, the boy, whom we named after my maternal grandfather, and I – ushered in the holiday together at the hospital. Our daughter would meet him the next morning when she awoke. Her reaction was much more – shall we say – positive than mine when my younger sister was born almost 34 years ago. ("When are you taking her back?" I reportedly asked.)

A year later, we are preparing for a return engagement at my parents – the farm will have to wait another year, alas. The tiny creature we brought to the house I grew up in as midnight approached on that first night of Pesach, just as my father opened the door to welcome Elijah, has grown into a little man with an infectious smile. Our daughter has matured so much it seems unbelievable.

Without a doubt, this has been the most challenging year of our lives – having two kids, after all, makes raising one seem like, well, child's play. (As for the dog, he might have had the roughest year of us all after he tore a ligament and required surgery to install a metal rod in one of his hind legs. But that won't stop him from enjoying his matzah brei.)

It's all been worth it, of course. And as our family prepares to celebrate our people's freedom, this year we'll have an extra story of Passover liberation to talk – and laugh – about at the seder.

ESSAY

The evolution of the Haggadah: a collector's perspective

Ellis Macmull

My interest in Haggadahs was sparked by a visit to Toronto's Ed Mirvish Art Gallery in 1974. Browsing through a Haggadah by Herbert Bronstein, I was captivated by the illustrations of Leonard Baskin. Since then, I have acquired new Haggadot each year in anticipation of the Passover holiday.

My memories of the Passover celebration revert back to my childhood in Mumbai (Bombay), India, seated around the festive table with extended family and friends. We read from a menagerie of well-used Haggadot, each sporting varying degrees of wine stains accumulated over the years. My great-grandparents emigrated from Baghdad, bringing with them Haggadot of the Sephardi liturgy. A few additions to our table were printed in Livorno, Italy, with the Ladino translation. Some Haggadot included an Arabic translation within the Hebrew script, which we read as well, extending the festivities past the midnight hour.

A product of Diaspora Judaism, the Haggadah was written by the great post-talmudic rabbis studying in Babylonian academies. The earliest extant written manuscript, a relatively complete fragment dated around the ninth and 10th century, was found in the Cairo genizah, a repository for discarded sacred writings.

Prior to the printing press, illuminated Haggadah manuscripts appeared in the 1300s. One of the earliest of these is the Ashkenazi Bird's Head Haggadah, a manuscript whose illustrations depict humans with bird-like faces wearing conical hats. Such a motif was employed due to the prohibition against graven images of human likeness. Portrayal of human figures with animal and bird-like heads were typically expressed in Jewish manuscripts in south Germany at the time. French Torah scholars, on the other hand, had a more accepting and moderate approach to the portrayal of the human form.

Jews throughout time have created lavishly decorated Haggadot. These are labours of love, the most extensively decorated of all Hebrew manuscripts. The distinctive Golden Haggadah, known for its generous use of gold leaf, emerged around 1320 and currently resides in the British Library. The exquisite Sarajevo Haggadah, which can be found at the National Museum of Sarajevo, is considered to be one of the oldest Sephardi Haggadot. It is handwritten on bleached calfskin and illuminated in copper and gold. Originating in Barcelona around 1350, it has had a turbulent history, having changed hands several times and surviving many close calls with destruction.

The birth of the printed Haggadah in the 15th century led to new innovations in creativity. Some Haggadot were illustrated with medieval woodcuts. The most famous of these, the Prague Haggadah of 1526, served as a prototype for those that followed.

Over the years, I have added to my Haggadah collection some older copies from the late 19th and early 20th centuries, a few illustrated from woodcuts or copper engravings. They include one published by Eliyahu ben Amozeg and Sons in Leghorn (Livorno), Italy, in 1865, printed, according to the Baghdad rite, in both Judeo-Arabic and Hebrew, and illustrated with woodcut blocks, depicting an embellished Hebrew letter at the start of a paragraph. Another, the Rodelheim Haggadah Shel Pasach, printed in 1863 with a German translation by Abraham Emanuel, illustrates the Exodus story within a medieval backdrop of knights and castles.

During the latter half of the last century, there was an explosion in contemporary Jewish art. Political artists such as Arthur Szyk filled the pages of their Haggadot with Jewish heroes and stunning calligraphy. Early modernist Marc Chagall brought a name to the art form that all could recognize, and later, Israeli artist David Moss revived the art of the illuminated Haggadah. Multiple editions of his prized Moss Haggadah have been published. Printed in elaborate folio editions showcasing full-page illustrations, these books are as suitably displayed on a coffee table as on a seder table.

A page from the Bird's Head Haggadah

Modern Jewish history has not only brought changes in printing and illustration methods, but in the very content of the Haggadah. Two major events have significantly contributed to the restructuring of today's Haggadah: the Holocaust and the struggle for an independent homeland. The Survivors' Haggadah is a unique post-Holocaust facsimile, created by survivors and displaced persons after the liberation, in preparation for the Passover holiday of 1946. Dedicated to those that escaped, the story of Jewish survival is interwoven with the traditional seder and illustrated with stark woodcuts created by survivor Miklos Adler, depicting the heart-wrenching deliverance to freedom. Escape Velocity is another apocalyptic Passover Haggadah, by Stanley Aaron Lebovic, son of a Holocaust survivor. Lebovic soulfully weaves memories of the decimation of European Jewry into the traditional Haggadah.

The closing words of the Haggadah, "next year in Jerusalem," were realized with the establishment of the State of Israel. New Haggadot provided testimony to the lives and ideals of the Jewish state's builders and depicted the renewed aspirations of Jews in their homeland. A prime example is Chaya and David Harel's Rebirth of Israel Passover Haggadah, printed in 1968, which provides an analogy of the Exodus story in the framework of the Jewish liberation and birth of Israel.

The 1969 Freedom Seder, produced in honour of Martin Luther King Jr., launched a new era of diversity in themed Haggadot. These include texts that focus on egalitarianism, feminism, the LGBTQ community, environmentalism and other causes that emphasize social and political justice. They are personalized, revised and recast so that the Haggadah remains relevant to our lives today.

While the structure of the Haggadah remains the same, the text has become a dais of creative ideas, emphasizing the theme of freedom. It has become a means of expression for a people targeted for victimhood. ■

The invisible thread that unites all Jews

In an excerpt from a new book, the late Edgar Bronfman looks back on his life and considers why Judaism has survived for 4,000 years

EDGAR M. BRONFMAN

One who teaches his son Torah, it is considered as if he taught his son, his son's son, and so on to the end of generations.

-The Talmud, Kiddushin 30a

Honour your Father and Mother.

-Exodus 20:12, Deuteronomy 5:16

One of the things I treasure most about Judaism is its emphatic insistence on the importance of family. In Judaism, we constantly find the message that life should be led within the community's embrace, not in isolation, and that family is at the centre of the community. My own home growing up was quite formal – I mostly feared my father and my mother was often remote – but the Jewish emphasis on family was nonetheless a sacrosanct value.

This value resonated with me during one of the most moving moments in my life: when I received a last blessing from my maternal grandfather. Throughout my childhood Gramps and I had been very close. He was tall with a goatee and though religious, he was not overly serious; he had a carefree manner and was always advising everyone to "take it easy." This attitude came through in everything about him. On the eve of my sister's wedding, for example, an uncle died. As an educated, religious Jew, Gramps was asked to rule on whether or not the wedding should go forward. Consistent with his character, Gramps ruled in favour of the mitzvah that stated joy should overcome sadness.

I also remember how Gramps would take me, my brother, and cousins to a tiny, hole-in-the-wall deli called Ben's and on mountains walks. As we noshed on smoked meat sandwiches or strolled through the crisp air, Gramps would quietly share his experiences with us, easily moving from the personal to the philosophical. But whatever the topic, he never instructed.

> I am not clear on why I thought less of my Jewish friends than of my elite Protestant companions

He just talked and gave us the space to arrive at our own conclusions.

When I was in my early 20s, I went to see him. I somehow I sensed this would be the last time we would meet (and it was) so I asked him for a blessing. I can still see him wrapping himself up in his blue and white prayer shawl, striking up a match, and lighting a candle. As he recited the ancient words, I felt moved to my marrow. I could almost physically feel an invisible thread joining us – first me to him, and then the two of us to our ancient forebears. With this, I stepped into a cycle of existence far greater than anything I could ever know or hope to understand, something I found immensely reassuring. To this day, whenever I recall the sensation of his hand gently resting on my head and hear the musical sound of his soft Hebrew in my memory, I am overwhelmed by an indescribable sense of loss and longing.

Sadly, the bond I felt then to my Jewish heritage did not further develop, and shortly thereafter I abandoned it all together. Part of this, I'm sure, is that despite my closeness to my grandfather, my connection to Judaism was weak. My parents, for whatever reason, failed to instill much-needed Jewish pride in their children. Though they gave us some Jewish education and contributed generously to Jewish causes during the war, my father seemed extremely conflicted about his Judaism; I would go so far as to say he harboured animosity. The contradictory ways in which the Judaism of my parents expressed itself created a deep ambivalence in me. One area in which this ambivalence played itself out was their choices for my education.

Because Father was a real Anglophile – he loved everything English – my brother, Charles, and I did not attend Jewish schools, but were sent to the Selwyn House School, a place that enrolled few Jewish boys. This arrangement resulted in us having two sets of friends: the Protestants at Selwyn House, and the Jewish kids from the synagogue, a place we viewed with less than enthusiasm. I don't think my parents ever understood how confusing this arrangement was for their children and how in my eyes, it automatically reduced our Jewish friends to the status of second-class companions. Even now, decades later, I am not clear on why I thought less of my Jewish friends than of my elite Protestant companions. I am afraid it's because I was reflecting my parents' feelings on the subject.

My parents' ambivalence about their Jewishness also showed up when I procured a golf caddy job at the Alpine Inn. There was a man from New York, a Mr. Kenny, who insisted on an English-speaking caddy. Unless he got one, Mr. Kenny would take his business elsewhere. As English-speaking caddies were rare, I sensed a negotiating opportunity and in the end not only got the caddying job, but succeeded in getting to play golf for free in the afternoon.

When I got home, I proudly told Mother of my employment victory. When she heard my story, her face took on a worried expression, and she informed me that I wasn't strong enough to caddy. Since my mother wasn't a typical Jewish mother, this response struck me as unusual. But when I hotly contested her assessment of my abilities, she offered no explanation. Instead, she offered to pay me what I would make in the morning if I agreed not to caddy in the afternoon.

What I didn't know at the time was the Alpine Inn was restricted – Jews were not welcome. Rather than tackle the topic of anti-Semitism head on, Mother avoided it. In fact, she bought me off.

My coffee with Israeli MK Ayman Odeh

Mira Sucharov

With so much justified concern over Israel's occupation, it's easy to forget about the challenges facing the country's Palestinian citizen minority. Last year's Israeli elections brought "Arab Israelis" – now numbering roughly 20 per cent of Israel's population – to centre stage, first by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's chilling statement that the Arabs "were coming to vote in droves," and then by the 13 seats won by the Joint List, headed by Ayman Odeh, making it the third-largest Knesset bloc.

I sat with Odeh recently over fair-trade coffee and pecan squares at a Bridgehead coffee shop in Ottawa, where he was between meetings with members of Parliament. With his hosts – members of the Palestinian-Canadian community – nearby, Odeh and I spoke in our best common language: Hebrew.

Odeh is serious, focused and warm. His message is simple and compelling: extend equality and deepen democracy in Israel. He is troubled by the discrimination he sees as rampant. There is the disparate school funding issue. There is the fact there are hundreds of towns and villages from which Arab residents are effectively barred due to vague "social suitability" criteria. There are the dozens of unrecognized villages in the Negev. And there is the fact that hundreds of "Jewish" towns have been built since 1948, but hardly any Arab towns. (Whether Jews or Arabs can easily live in "each other's" towns partly depends on access to schooling in their own language.)

While he's a "big supporter" of the Hand in Hand bilingual school network, he would like to see widespread curriculum reform.

Having been raised in the mixed Arab-Jewish city of Haifa, Oded is passionate about coexistence and educational biculturalism. "I love the poetry of Shaul Tchernichovsky and of Rachel [Bluwstein Sela]. It enriches me. I know about the history of the Jews, the pogroms, anti-Semitism, and the Holocaust."

But he is frustrated that Jewish schoolchildren don't learn Arabic as a matter of course, and what's more, the Ministry of Education severely truncates the study of Palestinian history and culture. "They let us study Palestinian poetry from 100 years ago, but nothing about contemporary Palestinian struggles."

He realizes that there is a broader state-building aim to this – one that rubs up uncomfortably against Palestinian identity. The goal of the Jewish-Israeli establishment, as Odeh perceives it, is to "build an Arab-Israeli identity" divorced from its Palestinian roots. "We want to be 100 per cent citizens," he tells me, but "this can only be done in a democratic, equal state for everyone."

While he declares support for any non-violent struggle against the occupation, including boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS), he is a passionate believer in a two-state solution and is not afraid to push back on BDS advocates who advance different goals. Believing Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to be "pragmatic" and committed to "peace and the two-state solution," Odeh blames Netanyahu for the lack of progress toward peace

Odeh returns to the theme of the collective good frequently. "If we're talking about the end of the occupation, it's a joint interest. Same with democracy and equality in Israel."

At least one Israeli establishment figure, Avrum Burg, a former speaker of the Knesset, has cast his lot with Hadash (Odeh's home party). In a recent podcast, Burg said that it's time for Israel to end "Jewish privilege." Most Israeli Jews, though, fear a loss of power. A recent Pew study revealed that 79 per cent of Israeli Jews say that when it comes to other citizens, Jews "deserve preferential treatment."

I asked Odeh whether, if his vision were to succeed, Israelis might, over time, lose their culture, their language or the rhythms of life in a Jewish state. "We have a real problem," he replies, whereas "you are talking about theoretical problems."

Ultimately, he says, in a message that's hard to argue with, "universal values protect the rights of all citizens." ■

We must hand down the heirloom of our faith

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Let us imagine a rare and precious jewel that was mined countless generations ago. It sparkles with near mystical brilliance against the sun. Its many facets cast luminous, shining light in every direction. So special, the jewel has been handed down from parents to children through the many ages of the family's existence. The gemstone has been coddled and wrapped, held close to the heart and protected by each generation's guardians against all the malign efforts by thieves and villains to take it over, to destroy it.

Imagine further that it is our turn to safeguard this marvellous heirloom.

Or, would we decide: Enough! The jewel has a cloudy, unclear provenance. It looks more cumbersome than elegant in this day and age. The shine is less dazzling when held against the myriad other dazzling suns of science and modern invention. And it is far too burdensome and far too expensive to keep safe for the next generation.

Would we break faith with the generations of our kin and be rid of it? Would we sell the jewel, dispose of it quietly? Or worse: would we make a public display of our disdain for something that was so tenderly beloved by our forebears?

If we were talking about a gem, a diamond, ruby or sapphire, few of us would do so.

Who among us would deprive our children of the opportunity to behold the precious item for themselves, to polish it, adjust it, embrace it in their own ways, to make it shine ever more brightly for themselves in their own time? To do so would be tantamount to stealing something irreplaceable from them.

If we would be so scrupulous to protect and hand down to our children the invaluably timeless heirloom of a gem, then how much more should we be scrupulous in handing down the invaluably timeless heirloom of our faith: our traditions, culture, sense of peoplehood and connection to our Judaism.

As we join in the Pesach seder, perhaps we might reflect anew on the imperative of holding tight to the lifeline of our Judaism in ways true to ourselves, so that, in turn, we will be able to hand it forward to the next generation.

Each generation should be given the opportunity to decide for itself whether and how to hold on to this life-sustaining heirloom, to make it uniquely its own. No one should take that choice away from the young generation by depriving them of the ability to make a reasoned decision based upon meaningful and substantive knowledge.

The best – though not the only – way to instil such knowledge is through education.

But as we know, alas, Jewish education has grown too expensive for too many families. Making it affordable is the most pressing and compelling priority facing Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

Perhaps it's true that every generation – when pondering the far-reaching implications of the weighty issues of its time – considers itself standing at a watershed moment of permanent significance. Indeed, perhaps the long line of Jewish history is but the cumulative, sequential fording, with courage, wisdom and determination, of one watershed after another?

In the preface to his commentary on the Haggadah (A Song of Ascents), Rabbi Eliezer Sadan refers to a statement by Rabbi Bachya Ibn Pakuda, the 11th-century scholar, philosopher and teacher in Chovot Halevavot (Obligations of our Hearts) that warrants our attention. More than a statement of philosophy, it is a rallying call to action.

"Caution itself counsels not to be overly cautious. If those who seek to make the world a better place or to elevate the moral standards of their generation were to wait until their projects reached perfection, then since the time of the prophets, all would remain forever mute."

At this year's seder, let us resolve not to take away from our children what our ancestors gave us, lovingly, to pass forward. ■

We may need to revisit our priorities

Rabbi Jay Kelman, CPA, CA

Isaac Newton's third rule of motion states that for every action there is an opposite and equal reaction. This rule of physics also applies in the moral and spiritual realms. The greater the potential for good, the greater the potential for evil. Nuclear energy has the potential for cheap, plentiful, reliable energy while lowering greenhouse emissions and, at the same time, has the potential to destroy the world.

This idea stands behind a rabbinic midrash that teaches the Messiah will be (or maybe already has been) born on Tisha b'Av. The day when we commemorate the great tragedies of Jewish history, including those that did not occur on Tisha b'Av, is the day renewal can begin. The deeper we sink, the higher we can rise. It's not by chance our tradition teaches that a repentant sinner can reach greater heights than one who has not tasted sin. When the energy used for negative purposes is harnessed for something positive the potential for good is increased – more so than had nothing negative transpired. The best person to teach the dangers of alcohol abuse is a recovering alcoholic (there's no such thing as a recovered alcoholic).

I was thinking of the above as I reflected on the amazing retirement of Adam Laroche, former first baseman for the Chicago White Sox. He was in line to earn $13 million this year, but walked away when he was asked by the team's management to curtail his habit of bringing his teenage son into the locker room. As the team noted, "In what profession does one have the right to bring their son to work?" While that sounds reasonable, Laroche has been bringing his son Drake to the clubhouse regularly for the last five seasons, with both the White Sox and his previous team, the Washington Nationals.

His teammates were fully supportive of Laroche and reportedly had to be persuaded by their manager not to skip their next game. It seems the son was well liked and was not a distraction. Baseball, after all, is not quite the same as other professions.

> We too often witness money being the source of families breaking apart

Whether or not ballplayers should bring their children to the clubhouse is not the issue that interests me. And the discussion about whether one can be asked to desist from an activity that was accepted with equanimity in the past, we will leave for another time. Laroche is, by any standards, a very rich man. He has earned millions of dollars over a 15-year career, including $12 million in 2015. Clearly, $13 million extra would have little or no impact on his life. In a decision that speaks volumes about his priorities, Laroche decided that spending more time with his child was worth more than $13 million. It is a powerful message and one very few would send.

Money enables us to do great good in many areas, and accumulating great wealth can be the catalyst for much good. Yet, at the same time, we too often witness money being the source of families breaking apart. Money can be the root of much evil. The truly rich are those who can use their wealth in pursuit of higher goals.

When we speak of ethical issues in the business world, we often focus on specific issues that arise in the course of our work: pricing policies, ethical advertising, conflicts of interest, hiring and firing workers, to name a few. We rarely focus on the broader issue of choosing a career that allows people to spend time with their family, to get involved in the community and to be in an environment where the highest value is not the bottom line.

Sadly, this is most difficult in an environment where a home under a million dollars is a bargain and the total cost of sending one child to Jewish day school can approach $300,000. ■

Passover contradictions that get in the way

Norma Baumel Joseph

There are troublesome contradictions embedded in the traditional format of the wonderful Passover seder. I say this not because I think we need to overhaul or radically change it, but because we need to be acquainted with them so that we might avoid or lessen these pitfalls. The purpose of the seder is to talk about, act out and learn about the process of liberation, of God's redemptive action. We eat symbolic food, drink four cups of wine, tell complicated stories, utter liturgical blessings, and sing silly songs so that we can fully recognize this one great moment of geulah, of rescue and salvation.

But contradictions can block our full acknowledgment.

First and foremost, we are obligated to eat matzah, the poor person's bread – the bread of haste. But have you checked the price of matzah this year or, in fact, of Passover foods in general? This holiday is not a poor person's holiday. Rather, it belongs to the rich, for only the wealthy can afford these prices. Matzah prices – especially for shmurah matzah – are in the range of expensive delicacies, rather than symbolic of poor person's fare. Shopping even for the basics on Passover requires a great deal of time, effort and money. How can we claim this holiday as a national celebration of redemption when it's not redemptive for all? How can we celebrate the reversal of the matzah from poor bread to one of high cost? Additionally, as the rules play out and accumulate, there is nothing of the haste in the preparation for this holiday. It takes a great deal of time and energy to get ready. For those who work outside of the domestic environment, getting it all accomplished on time is very difficult.

However, this conflict is not inherent in the Passover ritual. We can overcome it. We can work communally to open our doors to the poor and share. We can limit our buying, cut back on the special dishes, limit the menus, be satisfied with less, and be content with simple foods. Those cost-cutting items and sharing acts are within our grasp. I don't have to make three meats, four side dishes and chocolate pudding cake. But I do have to find a way to make the seder special. And food is one of the ways. Matzah and jam just won't pass muster. Is this then all about methods and resources?

> [The holiday] belongs to the rich, for only the wealthy can afford these prices

The next major contradiction engages the prayer/wish "Next year in Jerusalem!" Every year we sing it rather fervently, and every year I wonder who actually means it. Some do, I know. But most of us have absolutely no intent to really go live in Israel. There are a whole bunch of good reasons preventing us from immigrating. Perhaps we mean, "Let's go visit Israel"? Truthfully, not very many North American Jews actually ever visit Israel. Why not? Perhaps we can pledge to use Israeli products in our homes or use only Israeli wine for the seder and in some way concretize this proclamation, this dedication to Jerusalem – in some way make it real, so that there is no contradiction in your praxis.

But there is a conflict that is inherent in the traditional praxis and is highlighted this year. We tell the story at night. This Passover is a leap year and falls on a Shabbat. So the seder will start very late, after dark. But we pride ourselves on the wonderful way we involve our young children with four questions, lovely songs and special foods. How can we keep them up so late? How can we tell them the story so late? How can we keep their eyes open for those funny goat songs we sing after midnight? This is our painful dilemma. How do we fix this one discrepancy: the needs of our very young and the force of tradition?

We have managed, but the struggle continues to intensify. ■

Initiatives seek to lure Jews from 'unaffordable' Toronto

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The unaffordability of housing in Toronto's Jewish neighbourhoods has spurred some community leaders to lure young, growing families to areas outside the city where the cost of living is more reasonable.

A campaign called "Think Hamilton" led by Adas Israel Congregation director of operations Rabbi Chanan Weiser and the synagogue's spiritual leader Rabbi Daniel Green was initiated about a year ago.

"With expenses in Toronto being so high… we're just about 45 minutes away from Toronto, and it's a nice little option that is affordable and do-able," Rabbi Weiser said.

"The idea was really to let people know what goes on in Hamilton. I married a girl from Toronto and growing up, she didn't know anything about Hamilton. The only exposure she had to Hamilton was when you'd go down to Niagara Falls, you'd pass Hamilton and see the smoke stacks coming out of there. In her mind, there was nothing going on there."

He said Hamilton's Jewish population of about 5,000 has access to infrastructure such as shuls, Hebrew schools and kosher food. Since the campaign began last year, six Jewish families have moved from the GTA to Hamilton.

Rabbi Weiser spoke about the lower cost of living in Hamilton, which is a driving factor for young families.

He said small homes sell in the high 300s and low 400s, but there are also larger homes that range from half a million to $1 million.

In terms of the motivation to encourage Toronto Jews to move to Hamilton, "the more people you have, the more you can accomplish… in the community," said Rabbi Weiser, a California-native who chose to settle in Hamilton about four years ago to be close to his wife's family in Toronto.

"We're a GO train away from downtown Toronto. One guy who moved here from Thornhill said he didn't change jobs. His commute in total was an extra 10 minutes, and it's a more pleasant commute now that he's on the train."

He said part of the campaign is to offer an incentive of up to six months free rent for Jews moving to Hamilton.

"I calculated that saving six months rent, you save about $13,000 to $14,000, and you're on your way toward getting a down payment. It's a way to help and assist people in ways to help you get over that hump," he said, adding that the synagogue owns eight to 10 housing units that it can offer.

"We've been promoting people to come in and experience our community for a Shabbos, come visit and see what it's about."

A similar initiative called FrumCity –led by Rabbi Bernie Moskoff, Joseph Feldman and Rabbi Tsvi Heber – is also meant to address the problem with the unaffordability of Toronto's Jewish neighbourhoods.

According to the FrumCity website and an email sent to those interested in the initiative, which is still in its infancy, the idea is to create a "new Orthodox community in Innisfil, Ontario," minutes from Lake Simcoe, and to offer "a sustainable, affordable, growing, frum lifestyle, within a short commute of the GTA, by facilitating Jewish community infrastructure."

Rabbi Chanan Weiser with his wife Goldie and their three children

Rabbi Heber said the "idea is in very initial stages. We're reaching out to the community."

He added: "Obviously, you know what housing prices are like, therefore, there is an effort to put together a constituency that would move close by, within range, but a place that's cheaper. The Jewish community requires a group because of minyan and shul."

On the website, the project's originators state that "this grassroots community would welcome dozens of families, an energetic rav, shul, mikveh and possibly a community kollel at the outset."

The website clarifies that the enclave will not be "exclusively frum," as it will be part of a new community development open to the public.

"We are arranging our community to generally occupy one area at the outset."

The development of about 1,100 homes includes single, detached full brick homes starting in the low 400s.

"Our target is a minimum of 90 young families and our current list of interested families is currently at 134," the website states.

"There is an existing GO station in the south end of Barrie approximately nine minutes from the site. There is another GO station planned in Innisfil and the developer is optimistic that it will be located in close proximity to the subdivision. As well, there is a proposed highway 400 interchange."

The Tent City Jewish Congregation in Innisfil, which currently operates as a summer cottage shul, will be temporarily available to FrumCity newcomers.

But interested families should expect some growing pains.

When it comes to arranging transportation for children to get to school, there will be "a bus service or carpool option at the outset. Although this is challenging, it is part of building a new community. The more quickly this city gains traction, the faster this critical piece comes into focus." ■

Conservative rabbis rule in favour of kitniyot on Passover

plungen@thecjn.ca

This Passover, if you're a descendant of Ashkenazi Jews from Europe's cold, white north, your menu options may have taken a decidedly southern, Sephardi flavour.

Kitniyot, once classified under the forbidden family of chametz-resembling products, may now be accessible during the eight-day festival – at least among Conservative Jews.

Kitniyot, the Hebrew word that refers to legumes, rice, beans and corn, is permissible during Passover, according to a tshuvah, or answer, written by rabbis Avram Reisner and Amy Levin and approved by the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards associated with the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly (RA).

Their ruling examines the genesis of the long-established custom of Ashkenazim to not eat kitniyot during Passover and contrasts it with the Sephardi practice of permitting their consumption. In Ashkenazi circles, kitniyot were considered similar to chametz in that they swell when water is added.

The Conservative rabbis' religious ruling cited the cost of non-kitniyot foods, support for a healthier diet, "the inapplicability today of the primary concerns that seem to have led to the custom of prohibiting kitniyot," along with the need to make Judaism more accessible while removing "unneeded prohibitions."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, voted in favour of the Rabbinical Assembly's tshuvah.

He also was among those who signed a dissent, which, while recognizing health and other reasons for consuming kitniyot, urges caution in overturning centuries of Ashkenazi tradition. Conservative Jews ought to consult their rabbis before making a decision on the issue, he said.

In their ruling, the rabbis noted that the debate over kitniyot goes back to the 13th century, when some authorities permitted eating kitniyot, while others did not.

Twenty-five years ago, Rabbi David Golinkin, of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Israel ruled that changing circumstances – the marriages of Sephardim and Ashkenazim, the higher costs of packaged Passover products, gluten allergies, the needs of vegetarians – allowed the softening of the 800-year-old custom of avoiding kitniyot.

Despite the RA ruling, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl doesn't think hundreds of years of tradition will be undone any time soon.

"I don't see a mass rush to buy beans," he said.

The Gorman household has been debating the kitniyot issue for some time. Rabbi Sean Gorman of Pride of Israel Synagogue, and his wife, Jennifer, who is also a rabbi, weighed the pros and cons, and for the last 10 years, have permitted kitniyot in their home during Passover.

The kitniyot minhag, or custom, is one that makes no sense today. Even in the Middle Ages, rabbis called it "minhag shtut," or a nonsense custom, he said.

Moreover, there is no consensus as to what constitutes kitniyot, Rabbi Gorman continued. Some authorities permit peanut oil, while other rabbis do not permit it. What's more, peanut oil is being replaced by cottonseed oil, which is not only substantially more expensive, it is unhealthy, he said.

"There is no custom in the world that I should have to justify to my doctor. It's unreasonable to consume food like that," he said.

Rabbi Gorman also questioned the suggestion that minhagim are impervious to change, citing the example of quinoa, a berry that has become popular in recent years and is the subject of a debate as to whether it should now be included as kitniyot.

Excluding kitniyot makes the Passover holiday stressful for families who have to accommodate vegetarians, vegans and others with restricted diets. The higher cost associated with kitniyot substitutes leaves families with less money for tzedakah, Rabbi Gorman said.

News of the RA decision prompted a lively debate on Norene's Kitchen, a Facebook group run by CJN contributor and food maven Norene Gilletz.

"I will keep to the 'old' tradition," one commenter said.

"I know a lot of seriously observant people who have welcomed this ruling," stated another. "Traditions change over time, and geography, and not everyone feels bound by a medieval custom."

"The strength of Judaism is the rock of medieval customs," another poster replied. "You can stretch these customs only so far, and then Judaism weakens and slowly disintegrates."

Another commenter, seeing the range of opinions, summed up their view by saying: "What a can of worms this has opened. Oy!" ■

UJA Federation lays out strategic plan for renewal

SHERI SHEFA
ssheta@thecjn.ca

Following an 18-month "essential dialogue" with more than 2,000 community members, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto released a "strategic plan" that's focused on renewal and refuses to rest on the laurels of the century-old Jewish institution.

Federation officials say six priorities emerged from the consultations: caring for the vulnerable; forging strong bonds with Israel; advocating for Israel, the Jewish People and Canadian values; galvanizing the community in times of crisis and celebration; inspiring young generations to embrace Jewish life and ensure a Jewish future; and maintaining Toronto's position as a leader in Jewish education.

According to a statement about the plan by Morris Perlis, UJA Federation's chair of the board of directors, and federation president and CEO Morris Zbar, information from studies such as the 2011 Canadian National Household Survey confirmed that "local Jewish poverty is on the rise; global anti-Semitism and efforts to delegitimize the State of Israel are at elevated levels; approximately 30 per cent of local young Jews are marrying non-Jewish partners; and participation in high-impact Jewish educational programs, particularly day schools, is decreasing."

To implement the strategies to address these priorities, "more than $2 million has been removed from our operating budgets and our staff team has contracted by 16 per cent."

On April 12, the federation hosted a "community conversation" at the Lipa Green Centre about the plan.

In one of the five sessions offered, Sara Lefton, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' Greater Toronto vice-president, led a discussion about the challenges and strategies of Israel advocacy.

She said CIJA reaches out to "advocacy targets" including decision-makers at universities – "people who are in control of what goes on in different segments of the university campus."

When it comes to reaching out to the 197 newly elected MPs "from ridings where there may not be a single Jew… who have never before been forced to think about the Jewish community, never before had to think about Israel, have never been to Israel… CIJA has been taking members of Parliament to Israel on advocacy missions for years."

She said CIJA has taken about 30 of the new MPs to Israel so far, and when they return, they become advocates for the state.

Sara Lefton

Community volunteer Joseph Shier commended efforts by Jewish groups to reach out to influencers and to seek their support, but said despite that, Israel supporters are losing the "propaganda war."

"We have felt that we cannot win the battle, therefore we have withdrawn from that, and we've decided that we can try to fight on a different level," Shier said.

When challenged that the organized community doesn't seem to be attacking anti-Israel activists head-on, Lefton said, "I believe truly that the way for us to win and the way for us to really make a difference and have an effective advocacy strategy is to speak to the people who will be receptive to our message… This isn't a cop-out. This is a real strategy."

In another session about forging strong connections with Israel, Adam Minsky, UJA's senior vice-president of community capacity-building, spoke about efforts to reach out to the Jewish community in war-torn Ukraine.

"There is an ongoing war in the eastern part of the Ukraine. We have, for the first time since the Second World War, a Jewish refugee population in Europe," Minsky said.

"Together with the American Joint Distribution Committee, we are feeding thousands of displaced Jews on a daily basis, providing health care to them in the Ukraine. We're also working with that community to help those who want to leave and make aliyah to come to Israel."

Michael Diamond, founding chair of federation's Israel engagement committee, spoke about the Shinshinim program, founded in 2007, which brings young Israelis to Toronto day schools and shuls as emissaries.

Diamond said the program tries to re-engage young Jews who've disconnected from the Jewish and pro-Israel community "because of bad PR related to Israel. We were losing those kids, even the ones who were going right through day school." ■

Mayor promotes Tel Aviv's entrepreneurial culture

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai amiably joked at a Toronto luncheon April 14 that the reason he's "shlepping all over the world" is to find partners to help support Tel Aviv reach its full potential as a cosmopolitan and entrepreneurial centre.

Huldai was in Toronto to meet with the Tel Aviv-Yafo Foundation, his city's international fundraising arm, of which he is chair, and which has offices in Israel, the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Germany.

The luncheon, held at the offices of the investment firm ReichmannHauer Capital Partners in First Canadian Place, was hosted by Toronto business leaders and philanthropists Justin Linden, Leerom Segal, Michael Serruya and Philip Reichmann, co-founding partner of ReichmannHauer Capital Partners.

The event drew about 20 guests, including Israel's consul general to Toronto and western Canada, DJ Schneeweiss.

Huldai, who was first elected in 1998 and is serving his fourth consecutive term, spoke about the creative and youthful energy that's taken hold in Tel Aviv in the past two decades.

Not only has the number of young people doubled in recent years, with people aged 18 to 35 now comprising 33 per cent city's of the population, Huldai said, but Tel Aviv has committed to fostering a culture that nurtures youth and their contributions to economic and cultural life, he said.

"We've been taking public spaces and transforming them into co-working spaces... and we were one of the first cities in the world to provide free Wi-Fi on the streets, on the beach, so people can sit anywhere and work."

He noted that much of the money raised by the Tel Aviv-Yafo Foundation supports educational initiatives.

This environment, Huldai said, has helped establish Tel Aviv as a hub for Israel's thriving start-up economy. In his introductory remarks, Segal said there are more than 1,000 start-ups in Tel Aviv alone, making it the largest per capita start-up centre in the world.

Huldai stressed that in addition to understanding the needs of Tel Aviv's residents and giving them "the atmosphere or ecosystem that they need to live," his mandate has been to emphasize Tel Aviv's core values. "These are to be a bastion of democracy, pluralism, art, culture, science, research, rational thinking and a place that's open to every minority."

Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai

He cited as examples that Tel Aviv has been ranked among the top three most attractive tourist destinations and one of the "most gay-friendly cities in the world."

To continue this work and to fully achieve what Huldai said is "our vision for the city," Tel Aviv will need the support of international partners who can contribute to the Tel Aviv-Yafo Foundation through donations, collaboration on projects or by becoming a member of its board.

In a question-and-answer session, one attendee asked the mayor whether the city is interested in developing the area in south Tel Aviv near the boardwalk and nice hotels, which the attendee said is "like a slum."

Huldai said that over the past 100 years, Tel Aviv's more affluent residents have moved and built houses in the north part of the city, while people of lower socio-economic status have tended to live in the south.

He said that some development has started in south Tel Aviv, but more work needs to be done. "That's part of the reason I'm here looking for partners... We haven't achieved this yet."

Another attendee asked about the influx of African migrants and how the municipal government is balancing what he called the "strain" on the city with its responsibility to help these people.

Huldai acknowledged the challenge, and said that 50,000 illegal immigrants currently live in Tel Aviv, that the cost to educate their children is high and that some of the migrants have clashed with Israelis in the neighbourhoods where they've settled.

"But we can't ignore them," he said, adding, "a human being is a human being. I don't care if he's legal or not, and we must do everything in our capacity to care for them... If we treat them well, it's better for everyone in the city." ■

Record growth at Sutton Group Admiral: "if you build it, they will come"

Murray and Sol Goldkind had a vision: a state-of-the-art home selling environment in an environment that felt like...well, home.

How novel.

"In brainstorming about the type of facility in which to accommodate the growth of our sales force, the one thing we kept coming back to is that the new home for our agents and brokers should be more than just another four-wall office environment," says Broker of Record Murray Goldkind. "It occurred to us that most of the new real estate offices being built to sell more homes don't feel like home themselves."

"A great salesperson will be successful regardless of his or her surroundings," says Sol, "but creating an office environment that feels like home puts everyone in a house-selling frame of mind."

A growing number of talented agents and brokers agree. The spike in Sutton Group Admiral's growth curve since the opening of the new Centre Street office proves that "if you build it, they will come." In recent months, Sutton Group Admiral has welcomed aboard numerous industry stalwarts like Esther Greenbaum, Sarah Tamin, Emad Petro, Mitzy Dadoun, Sarah Smilovici & Anna-Maria Waskiewicz.

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Andrea Halpern, formerly of Remax Realtron, has settled into her new digs without skipping a beat. Except she doesn't "settle."

"Never" says Andrea. "My customers don't settle for less than the best, nor do I. Sutton Group Admiral provides a level of technical and administrative support that allows me to maintain a singular focus on my customers' needs. As a brokerage, I can't ask for anything more."

This eye-on-the-prize philosophy is nothing new at Sutton Group Admiral. "It's always been about the customer," says Murray. "Their needs come first."

Serving those needs means getting the seller's best return on their property and the buyer the best value. "Our people can only do that if all of their energies are focused on their clients' needs. You can't operate at a fast clip if you're looking for paper clips."

"Since Day One," says Sol, "we have never rested on our laurels. "In this business, if you're not three steps ahead of the game, then you're behind it."

In the case of the new Centre Street office, "three steps ahead" might be an understatement. In its 15,000 square feet of state-of-the-art office space, the new Centre Street office houses the kind of cuttingedge services and facilities that Admiral agents need to further enhance the top-drawer service they give their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral formula in action: maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team — over 400 salespeople and brokers — has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Murray prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Family seder a tradition for more than 65 years

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

If by chance you were to walk into the dining hall at the Adath Israel Congregation on the second night of Passover, you might think you'd chanced upon an oddly timed bar mitzvah celebration.

There, at tables scattered throughout the hall, you'll find 98 people enjoying a meal and revelling in each other's company.

But it won't be a young man's rite of passage being celebrated this night. As has been the tradition for more than 65 years, the Applebaum family will again gather for the Passover seder. They've been doing it ever since Nechemiah and Esther Shaindel Applebaum, Stephen Applebaum's grandparents, convened a family seder in their Kensington-area home.

Of course, back then, the family was a lot smaller – just the parents and their four children, three girls and one boy.

Ben Applebaum was Stephen's dad, while his aunts were Mary Wasserman, Betty Little and Rae Goldstein.

Each went on to have families of their own, and from those children came more children, who married and had more children.

Today, the guest list at the Applebaum seder includes four generations, all of them descended just on the paternal (Nechemiah's) side, said Stephen. The original two generations – his grandparents and their four children and spouses – are no longer with us, but the remaining four generations span ages ranging from 76 to kids only a couple of months old.

FAMILY PHOTO

The seder is an important part of family life, the glue that keeps it together and allows everyone to keep in touch, and meet new spouses and children, Applebaum said.

At 58, Stephen is one of the older participants. He can remember the early days of the seders back when he was a youngster. The Goldstein, Wasserman, Little and Applebaum families took turns hosting them, he recalled. Once every four years, they'd all head out to Hamilton, where the Goldstein family resided.

He recalls those seders fondly.

"My father ran the seder," Applebaum said. "He was very serious about it, but he always had a smile" for the children.

"It was always great to hang out with my cousins. That's how my family has remained so close over the years. It allows the cousins to meet [others'] children, their spouses. It's a time when we all get together. Everybody knows to come to the Applebaum family seder."

As in many other families, the head of the household – in this case, Stephen's brother, Alan – leads the seder and calls upon others, including the children, to participate by reading from the Haggadah.

The family has added a tzedakah component to the tradition – raising money for a worthwhile charity. Past recipients have included Ve'ahvata, Baycrest and the One Family Fund. Applebaum expects the family will raise about $10,000 this year.

Putting together a seder on this scale is a monumental undertaking, one that requires lots of lead time.

"For me it's a lot of work. I start working on it in January. It's like making a bar mitzvah. We do it because it's something we like to do."

His friends and acquaintances can't believe their ears when he tells them how many people are on the guest list.

"When I tell this story to people, they say, 'You've got to be kidding me. How do you do it?'"

Ninety-eight is a pretty big number, but it could have been more. The original guest list topped out at 108, but some of the invitees were not able to make it this year.

But it's a safe bet there will be another big family seder next year and yet another opportunity to create new memories for the descendants of Nechemiah and Shaindel Applebaum. ■

CJPAC marks 10 years of its annual Action party

dkoren@thecjn.ca

For its 10th annual Action party, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) brought the glitz and the glamour back to Andrew Richard Designs, a posh art space that served as the event's venue years ago.

A lot has changed since then – the number of attendees has more than doubled, for one thing – but the committee's mandate hasn't wavered: their goal is to engage the Jewish and pro-Israel community in Canadian politics and democracy.

"It's a great opportunity for those who are new to politics to meet with members of the political community from all levels of government," said Mark Waldman, the group's executive director. "It serves as an entry point for people to get engaged with politics."

More than 1,300 young professionals and politicians gathered on April 14 to shmooze, nosh on hors d'oeuvres, drink sophisticated cocktails and shake hands with elected members of Parliament and dignitaries, including Israeli Consul General DJ Schneeweiss, Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai, Liberal MPs Michael Levitt and Judy Sgro and Tory MPs Tony Clement, Peter Kent and Jason Kenney to name a few.

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne was also in attendance.

While CJPAC's ultimate goal is to enlighten and educate others about the political process, one wouldn't know it by attending Action, which has earned a reputation among Toronto Jews as the quintessential Jewish party of the year.

"Part of its charm is that people can interact on their own with elected officials," Waldman said, touting its casual and informal atmosphere. "Some people are intimidated by politicians, but at Action, they see how they're regular people just like anyone else."

Michael Westcott, 2016 Action co-chair, said the event is successful because it casts a wide net – and not just to members of the Jewish community.

"We've seen greater involvement and greater participation," he said. "It offers a forum for getting involved, but also a great opportunity for people new to the political process to participate in a great party, and enjoy food, drinks and entertainment in a relaxed setting."

Waldman said 2015 was a particularly successful year for CJPAC because of the federal election – the group connected young people from across the country to at least 230 political campaigns – and he aims to continue on that trajectory in 2016.

"It's important for people to get involved, not just during elections but in between elections as well," Waldman said. "That's the big hope with this event, to bring people in, engage them politically, and hope that they get involved, build relationships and participate in our democracy."

Throughout the year, CJPAC also offers opportunities for high school and university students to get involved through fellowship programs, training programs and other initiatives. Visit www.cjpac.ca for more information. ■

Mideast conflict is 'the elephant in the room'

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Karen Mock is a human rights consultant who's been working to foster Jewish-Muslim dialogue in Canada for 30 years.

An active member of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM), a non-profit group committed to bringing the Jewish and Muslim communities in Canada closer together, Mock echoed the sentiment of others leading the charge on Muslim-Jewish relations with her assertion that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is "the elephant in the room" when the two communities get together.

On top of that, she said, both Jews and Muslims – whether or not the latter have Palestinian roots – are likely to draw some flak or disparagement from their own communities for engaging in dialogue.

"Muslims [doing interfaith work with Jews] are likely to have their Muslim or Arab friends say to them, 'Your friends the Jews,' just as the Jews [doing interfaith work with Muslims] are likely to have their Jewish friends say to them, 'Your friends the Arabs,'" said Mock, whose past roles include president of the Ontario Multicultural Association, CEO of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

Those challenges aside, she emphasized the point made by a number of Jewish and Muslim leaders at the forefront of interfaith efforts: that a foundation of mutual trust and understanding is an essential building block, without which broaching the Israeli-Palestinian conflict isn't possible.

But while some Jewish and Muslim organizations and leaders see making the shift from building bridges to more substantive political dialogue as an important and feasible next step, others in the Jewish community express varying degrees of skepticism about efforts to improve Jewish-Muslim relations and what this can achieve.

Mock stressed that establishing Jewish-Muslim friendship at the grassroots level isn't an end in itself, but a vital tool for countering extremist views and inflammatory rhetoric among both Jews and Muslims.

"You can't have conversations [about Israel] with people who've never met a Jew or who've only read propaganda that crosses the line from criticizing Israel's government policy to lambasting all Jews," said Mock, noting that she's speaking about dialogue with "non-extreme Muslims – and that's a huge population of Muslims."

But more than simply meeting and spending time with each other, both Jews and Muslims must understand the other side's narrative, as well as their pains and sensitivity to certain language, in order to begin a constructive dialogue about issues such as Israel.

For example, Mock said, Jews engaged in this dialogue can explain to their Muslim counterparts why calling Israel an "apartheid state" is deeply hurtful to many Jews, and Muslims can convey that to their communities.

On the other hand, she said, there are Canadian Jews who claim there's no such thing as a Palestinian person or nation, though many people identify as such. "Jews who are further ahead in the [Jewish-Muslim] conversation can help [others] recognize that it's not helpful to denounce someone's identity," Mock said.

Shahid Akhtar, co-chair of CAJM, also emphasized that building friendships between Muslims and Jews is important, but the process can't end there. Once bonds have been established, the political situation in Israel can't be omitted from the conversation, given that most Muslims in Canada feel strongly about the Palestinian cause, he said.

"Unless we face reality as it is, our attempt at dialogue will just be an exchange of latkes, samosas and polite conversation. It will be meaningless," Akhtar said.

Conversations need to lead to action, he maintained, whether it's Jewish and Muslim groups collaborating on a joint projects in Canada – like initiatives to help Syrian refugees – or efforts to build equality and security in Israel.

For example, he noted a recent event in Toronto, where supporters of Heart to Heart, a program that brings Jewish Israeli and Palestinian Israeli teens to a summer camp near Ottawa, met with the directors of Givat Haviva – one a Jewish Israeli and one a Muslim Palestinian citizen of Israel. The Israeli non-profit aims to build an inclusive society by engaging divided communities in Israel.

Directly addressing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict opens up both groups' perspectives and their ability to "see that the other side's hurt is as intense as their own," Akhtar said, but it also creates a positive model for Jewish-Muslim relations that might encourage dialogue elsewhere.

Samira Kanji is president of the Noor Cultural Centre, a Toronto Islamic cultural centre that's engaged in Jewish-Muslim interfaith work.

Not only can getting to know one another change attitudes on both sides, she said, but "to the extent that our communities here influence positions and behaviours in Israel-Palestine, there could then be a positive fallout for the political conflict in that region."

She added: "I imagine Jewish communities globally have much more influence on Israel than do Muslim or Arab communities on the Palestinians, although Muslims globally do empathize with the Palestinians, seeing them as patsies for Europe's crimes against Jews."

Shimon Koffler Fogel, the CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), told The CJN via email that his group works to build relationships with many ethnic and faith communities in Canada, including Muslims, and that CIJA has, for example, "a very positive and constructive relationship with the Ahmadiyya Muslim community and the Ismaili community," in addition to relationships that exist between the communities on the grassroots level.

But while it's in the interest of the Jewish community to have strong relationships with Muslim Canadians, Fogel said, "the imperative does not negate the significant challenges we have with particular trends and views among some Canadian Muslims. In specific, and without wanting to paint a broad brush, we strongly object to the fact that some Muslim leaders and institutions in Canada have expressed views utterly at odds with Canada's core values. This includes sexist, homophobic, anti-Zionist and even anti-Semitic opinions."

He did not mention specific organizations, but Fogel said there are some Muslim groups and leaders with whom CIJA will not partner or engage in dialogue because of their views.

It's important to collaborate with Muslim groups that are "credible partners and moderate voices" on issues of common cause locally, such as countering hate crimes and preserving religious freedoms, Fogel said, noting, "we are looking at outreach to multiple Muslims communities – some of which will be more receptive, some with which we can establish deeper relations and some of which will unfortunately remain beyond our reach."

Tyler Levitan, campaigns co-ordinator for Independent Jewish Voices Canada, said it's important to first recognize that Muslims in Canada are extremely diverse and come from different parts of the world. "Their views and experiences as they relate to Israel's behaviour and political Zionism likely differ considerably based on where they're from," he said.

Meir Weinstein, national director of the Jewish Defence League in Canada, said he supports the Jewish community getting along with all communities in Canada, and he noted his good rapport with Tarek Fatah, a Canadian Muslim journalist and activist who's advocated for liberal, progressive forms of Islam.

Weinstein said he has no problem with Jewish groups talking to Muslim groups about Israel and doesn't see the need for "pre-conditions" to discussions of this nature, such as for Muslims to acknowledge Israel's right to exist.

However, Weinstein added, "The reality is that the Islamic world doesn't want a Jewish state in the Middle East, so we have to understand that, and we don't want to support any efforts where Israel will have to withdraw land... We can't be naïve. But as far as getting along socially, everything's good." ■

Trustee remembered for his belief in social justice

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto Ward 5 public school trustee Howard Kaplan, who has died at age 72, was remembered as a committed secular Jew who believed strongly in social justice and was an advocate for students.

Kaplan died April 11 of an auto-immune disorder that battered his liver – "too complicated to explain here," he wrote on his Facebook page last autumn.

He was first elected in Ward 5 (York Centre) in 2010 and re-elected by a larger margin in the 2014 elections.

He was "a passionate advocate for public education who truly believed in what he was doing," eulogized Toronto District School Board chair Robin Pilkey at Kaplan's funeral. He was "principled, dedicated, interesting and interested," she said.

Fellow trustee Shelley Laskin said Kaplan "advocated for students and families within his community and championed issues of equity and social justice."

Kaplan's ward contained 19 elementary and four secondary schools. Among them was the controversial Africentric Alternative School that shares a building with Sheppard Public School near Keele Street and Sheppard Avenue.

When he was elected, he was "a bit skeptical about the Africentric school," Kaplan recalled a few years ago. "I have never seen in any other school within my ward such an engaged parent council. When they come to school council meetings, it's so huge they have to meet in the gym."

Kaplan added that he found no evidence of exclusion at the school, opened in 2008, in response to critics who argued that it would be segregationist.

Last year, he was one of just two trustees to vote against terminating a controversial partnership between the TDSB and the Chinese government-sponsored Confucius Institute.

Firmly and proudly on the political left, and an ardent Yiddishist, Kaplan had leadership roles in the United Jewish People's Order, the Winchevsky Centre and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

He was born in Toronto, earned a teacher's certificate and became an early computer programmer for Ontario Hydro, spurning a management position. "He wanted to be with the workers," said his son, Ari.

Howard Kaplan

In the late 1960s and early '70s, he became active in the Waffle, the radical wing of the New Democratic Party, bringing his children to protests.

Feeling the pull of Zionism in 1978, he moved his wife and two children to Israel for a year, to the country's sole communist kibbutz, Yad Hanna.

Whether picking fruit or guarding the entrance with a rifle, "he fell in love with kibbutz life," his son told The CJN.

He then spent all of the 1980s living in Denmark, where he continued his activism in left-wing causes and learned fluent Danish. He returned to Toronto in 1991.

Kaplan often adjudicated in student suspension and expulsion hearings, said fellow trustee Gerri Gershon.

"Whenever families came into the room, they were feeling uptight. Howard always tried to make them feel at ease by trying to say a few words in their language," Gershon told The CJN. "He was always respectful of contrary opinions. I never heard him speak ill of anyone – a rare occurrence in politics."

Later in life, "he had this brilliant idea that he was going to actualize his political [side]," his son said with a chuckle. "He loved being a trustee. He described it as his favourite job. For him, his renaissance really started in his late 60s.

"He really epitomized what it meant to be a secular Jewish humanist where ritual is secondary to culture and identity."

Kaplan is survived by his partner Joanne Chisholm, daughter Elyse Tera, son Ari, two sisters and three grandsons. ■

Givat Haviva leaders help celebrate Heart to Heart

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Yaniv Sagee, left, and Mohammad Darawshe

Yaniv Sagee and Mohammad Darawshe come from two very different worlds, but they share some common goals.

Sagee is a Jewish kibbutznik, the son of a survivor who left Europe after the Holocaust, while Darawshe is an Israeli Arab who traces his family's roots in Nazareth back 28 generations.

Dissimilar though they may be, they have a vision for Israel that is free of discrimination, a country in which Jews and Arabs share civic equality and where co-operation, not conflict, is the order of the day.

Both men play important roles in the Givat Haviva Center for Shared Society, a non-governmental agency that advances their goals by providing educational, cultural and other programming to Jewish and Arab communities in Israel. Sagee serves as its executive director, while Darawshe is the organization's director of planning, equality and shared society.

Both were in Toronto earlier this month to help celebrate Heart to Heart, a Givat Haviva program run in Canada in partnership with Hashomer Hatzair/Camp Shomria Canada. The program brings 20 Palestinian and Jewish youngsters to Canada each summer for a camping and educational experience.

An April 10 celebration at the Lula Lounge on Dundas Street West was sponsored by JSpace Canada, Congregation Darchei Noam, Congregation Shir Libeynu, Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, Givat Haviva, Hashomer Hatzair/Camp Shomria Canada and Peace Now.

Darawshe kicked off joint discussion with Sagee by noting his family's multi-generational connection to his home. Despite frustrations, "we have no intention of breaking that in my lifetime," he said.

Darawshe said despite experiencing discrimination and being treated as a second-class citizen he has chosen to challenge the status quo and change things for the better. His goal, he said, is to be an agent for social change and help prepare new generations of young people to do the same.

At the heart of the problem – "The mother of all evil in Israel" – is the country's segregated educational system, he continued. A holdover from the Turkish era, it keeps Jews and Arabs apart. The absence of interaction allows negative stereotypes to develop. Polls show that a majority of children in each system hold racist views of the others, he said.

Givat Haviva recognizes it's impossible to bus students from one community to schools in another, so it has promoted something else: the exchange of teachers.

Currently, there are 360 Arab teachers in Jewish schools, up from six in 2005, and in September 2014, there were 18 Jewish teachers in Arab schools, with the goal to raise the number to 50 next year, he said.

"They challenge stereotypes by their mere presence," Darawshe said. By seeing a real human being instead of a caricature, the other side is "naturalized" and "humanized," he added.

A key focus of the endeavour is to promote mutual interests and the concept of a shared society. There will be disagreements, he conceded, but also discussion.

Sagee pointed to his family's history in Israel, as well as that of his kibbutz, located in an area where 17 Palestinian villages once could be found. The year 1948, the year of Israel's birth and the year his father immigrated to the country, was also the year of the Palestinian "Nakba," or disaster, he said.

Sagee stressed Givat Haviva's goal for a "shared society" in which citizens are equal. Currently, however, Jews and Palestinians are afraid to even visit each other's communities.

Students who experience the Givat Haviva programs are potential agents for social change. Sagee noted that the government of Israel supports Givat Haviva programming for a shared society. That has helped paint the organization as a legitimate movement worthy of public support, he added.

Givat Haviva was founded in 1949 by the Kibbutz Federation. It offers programming in a number of areas, including its Children Teaching Children initiative, a two-year civic study and encounter program that is part of the curriculum in Israeli schools. The goal of the program is to foster mutual understanding and shared citizenship.

On the municipal front, Givat Haviva fosters co-operation between neighbouring Jewish and Arab towns to address common goals. Givat Haviva also offers programming that brings individual Arabs and Jews together to experience cultural activities, in the arts, films and tours.

And of course, there is Heart to Heart in which an equal number of Jewish and Arab teens visit Camp Shomria and hold discussions and educational activities that "challenge the traditional power dynamics at work in the region," according to the Heart to Heart website. ■

JDL opens chapter in Calgary to fight 'rabid Jew-hatred'

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Don Sharpe

Meir Weinstein

With the launch of a new Jewish Defence League chapter in Calgary, JDL Canada's national director Meir Weinstein says he's fulfilling his promise to expand across the country.

"It's one of the goals of the JDL to open up chapters in major cities, and that's what we're doing. So we're there to fulfil that need and fulfil that promise to those who called us," Weinstein said.

This development comes about a year after chapters were established in Vancouver and Montreal, which elicited criticism from Jewish community leaders.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of security for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs in Montreal, told The CJN last year, "there is no void [in Montreal] that needs to be filled" and that "fear-mongering is not helpful."

Last month, Weinstein travelled to Calgary to lead a public meeting held at the Metropolitan Centre, which attracted about 150 people.

He said Calgary needs a JDL presence, referring to an incident in July 2014, during the Israeli offensive in Gaza, when hundreds of pro-Palestinian supporters gathered outside Calgary City Hall and members of a family who came to show their support for Israel were assaulted.

"There were some members of the Jewish community and supporters of Israel who showed up to counter it and hold some Israeli flags and signs, and they got beat up pretty bad," he said.

"We received a lot of calls from people to re-establish," he said, explaining that Calgary had a JDL chapter in the 1980s when teacher James Keegstra, an anti-Semitic Holocaust denier, was making headlines.

The Jewish Free Press reported that it was a "one-person show run by the late Harvey Kane... who staged public protests at the courthouse where Keegstra was being tried for hate crimes."

Don Sharpe, who volunteered to lead the new Calgary chapter, spoke to The CJN about his motivation to be part of the organization.

"I don't understand why everybody isn't a part of the JDL. I really don't," said Sharpe, who isn't Jewish.

"I don't see any other group doing the kind of work the JDL does. Let's talk about what is happening now with the [Calgary] Jewish Federation. It's a wonderful group of people and they work very hard to be inclusive of all people and sharing their faith, but they're really not confronting what I see as the main problem here, and that is the rabid Jew-hatred that exists in this city, the Jew-hatred that allowed [some people] to get beaten up by a group of protesters at a pro-Palestinian rally... That hatred will grow unless it's confronted, and I don't mean confronted with nice words, or come over to my house to have dinner. The bad guys don't want to have dinner with us."

Jeffrey Smith, chair of the Calgary Jewish Federation's community relations committee, stopped short of criticizing the JDL, but said "they are a new organization in this community and the Calgary Jewish Federation is basically taking a wait-and-see approach, to see what kind of activities they involve themselves in, in this community. So we're really just leaving it at that at this stage."

Sharpe said the JDL in Calgary plans to have a presence, "every time there is a BDS event, every time there is a Jew-hatred event, every time there is an anti-Israel event – we're going to show up and we're going to counter that narrative with the truth."

On April 28, the JDL will be hosting Robert Spencer, an American author who is an outspoken critic of Islam and director of Jihad Watch, at Calgary's Metropolitan Centre.

"We would like one day for the federation to realize that we all have the same goals. We believe that Jew-hatred needs to be confronted all the time, immediately," Sharpe said.

"At the last anti-Israel event I went to, there was a guy at the back who called out during the question period, 'Why don't we just kill all the Jews?' This was in a public arena, this was in the John Dutton Theatre at the Calgary Central Library... that horrified me... The JDL will always confront this kind of hatred and will never back down." ■

Pride in Jewishness begins in the family home: Bronfman

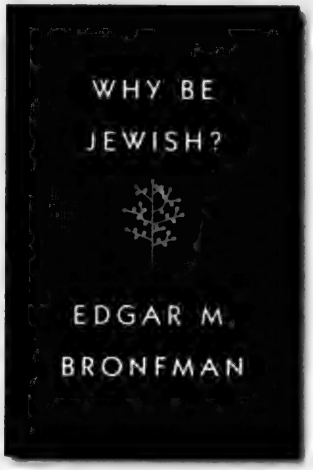
In the end, this was all very confusing to a 15-year-old boy.

The Judaism of my parents and the Judaism of my own generation was not a joyful Judaism. It was one forged in the fires of pogroms in Russia from which my grandparents fled, and deepened by the horror of the Holocaust. Although we were safe in Canada, the pain of the millions of Jews being murdered in Europe rested heavily on our shoulders. There was a vague, haunting sadness to being a Jewish child in the 1940s, even in the relative safety of North America. The calamity happening overseas was never discussed in our home, but we all knew anyway. Anti-Semitism during my youth, albeit less dramatic than the evils in Europe, was nonetheless damaging to the Jewish psyche. It wasn't just the physical manifestations of anti-Semitism: it was also an injury to the sense of self.

Despite their immense wealth, my parents did not escape this pain. On the one hand they were clearly Jews, but on the other, they were empire builders who longed to be bona fide members of the non-Jewish power elite, the majority of whom were not welcoming of Jews. Though they never said so, my guess is that if others had allowed them to do so, they may have cast off their Jewish identity at the first opportunity.

My lack of pride in my Jewishness might explain why I didn't protest my first wife's custom of celebrating Christmas, something not unusual for highly assimilated German Jews of that generation. I am sure that if I had voiced opposition Ann would have given up the holiday and would have also agreed to give the children as much Jewish education as I wanted. But I didn't object because it wasn't important to me. So for many years, we hung stockings by our fireplace and set up our fir tree, a grand and glittering affair that made no pretense at masquerading as that odd American invention, the Chanukah bush. On Christmas morning the air would fill with the excited squeals of our five children as they emptied their stockings and tore open their presents. I was not completely comfortable with all of this, especially receiving gifts from my in-laws, Petey and John Loeb, but since I lacked any real connection to my Jewishness, I dismissed my feelings as unimportant.



Looking back, I believe that had my parents consciously instilled Jewish pride in me during my formative years I would not have been so woefully indifferent to my Judaism. But I can't really blame them, because I followed in their footsteps, and failed to give my own children even the very basic Jewish education I'd received. If there is anything I regret, it is that as my children grew up, I gave them no Jewish tradition in our home. There was no Friday night meal to welcome the Shabbat, no observance of the holidays, and no Jewish learning.

This failing still haunts me. It is one of the reasons I spearheaded the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, a training program for young leaders. It's also why I have thrown myself and my resources into the revival of Hillel houses on campus and into the creation of MyJewishLearning.com, a website that offers information about Judaism from the most basic questions to advanced study and inquiry. And it's why I am so thrilled when Bronfman Fellowships alumni, like Rabbi Daniel Smokler, who is now director of education at the Bronfman Center at New York University, commit to bringing Jewish learning and text study to other young people in a way that is joyful and personal. Still, while initiatives and programs are much-needed, love of Judaism begins with family, at home.

After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, our sages determined that the home would become the new Temple, calling it a mikdash ma'at, or little sanctuary. As one midrash explains, "When the Temple stood, the altar offered atonement for Israel. Now, one's table offers atonement" (Brachot 55a). The Jewish home – or any home – should be more than a shelter: it should act as the centre of meaning, beauty, and connection to forces larger than ourselves.

In Jewish tradition, it is in the home that many of life's significant milestones, from the birth of a child to death and mourning, take place. As pointed out by Rabbi Andy Bachman, a well-known communal leader and dear friend, Judaism has rituals for all those aspects of life – birth, transition, marriage, death – in which people cry out for meaning. He believes, and I think I agree, that these life-sanctifying rituals, along with Shabbat, are one of the main reasons that Judaism has stayed alive for nearly 4,000 years. ■

Weizmann research could help treat host of diseases

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The findings from research by Prof. Irit Sagi, dean of the Feinberg Graduate School at Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, could have major implications in treating cancer, inflammation, infection and a number of autoimmune diseases.

Sagi, who teaches in Weizmann's department of biological regulation, was in Montreal and Toronto last month to share the results of a study she's been working on for the past two decades involving the examination of a group of proteins responsible for the progression of cancer, inflammation and many infectious diseases.

Addressing audiences of Weizmann donors, Sagi was the keynote speaker at parlour events in both cities, and she also spoke at a small event at the Israeli consul general's home in Montreal as well as at the home of a private donor in Toronto.

Sagi's research, which is being referred to as groundbreaking and was recently featured in Nature magazine, involved looking at the structure and reactivity of various proteins, also called enzymes, that invade a body's healthy tissues and cause damage to them.

Irit Sagi, front row third from the left, and her research team

In doing so, these enzymes contribute to a host of diseases. "Tissue damage is common to almost all invasive diseases, because the diseased cell infects the whole body through migration... the [invasive] protein paves a path for harmful cells to cross [a person's] tissues and veins and invade almost any organ in the body," Sagi said.

To figure out how to block a harmful enzyme, she explained, it's first necessary to understand the enzyme's structure and the way that it operates, both of which tend to be extremely complex.

Over the course of her research, her team has revealed, for example, the comprehensive structure of an enzyme called MMP9, which is known to be produced in metatastic cancer cells and in tissues attacked by autoimmune diseases.

Her research also included developing a precise method for tracking, in real time, the changes that occur in active enzymes.

Sagi said researchers are now using this method to develop a new generation of drugs.

Further, Sagi's research team successfully designed certain molecules, known as therapeutic antibodies, which work to block invasive proteins responsible for tissue damage. "These molecules we've developed are antibodies, and the way they work is that they bind these very harmful enzymes in a specific conformation. That's what makes them so unique – they target only the pathological [and not the healthy] form of the enzymes," Sagi said.

She said her team will continue to investigate the workings of these invasive enzymes, as well as try to apply their findings to the development of therapeutic drugs that could, "fight the tissue damage in a number of autoimmune diseases."

They're doing clinical trials to develop drugs for conditions such as Crohn's, as well as other inflammatory bowel diseases and autism. "The research she's done, such as her reversal of Crohn's disease in mice, has grabbed the attention of some pharmaceutical companies," said Lorie Blumer, a spokesperson for Weizmann Canada, a branch of an international network that supports the institute.

Sagi was born in Israel to a mother from Afghanistan and a father from Iran.

"At the Weizmann Institute, we have fantastic opportunities to do basic research, to work with superb students and colleagues and to access strong infrastructure," she said. "These components really help to move fast to come up with, and execute, groundbreaking ideas." ■

Anti-Semitism 'laundered' under universal values: Cotler

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thejcn.ca, MONTREAL

Anti-Semitism is at a level today not seen since World War II and is even more dangerous in the sense that it masquerades under the human rights banner, Irwin Cotler warned in the keynote address at a recent international conference at Indiana University on the topic.

"We are witnessing a new global, escalating, sophisticated, virulent and even lethal anti-Semitism reminiscent of the atmospherics of the 1930s, and without parallel or precedent," said Cotler, a former member of Parliament and justice minister, who shared his comments with The CJN following the conference.

A McGill University law professor emeritus, Cotler, after retiring from politics last year, founded and chairs the Raoul Wallenberg Centre for Human Rights.

Cotler terms what he views as the attempt to find a respectable cover for hatred of Jews and denial of their nationhood as "the laundering of delegitimization under universal public values."

The United Nations (UN) is the ultimate "protective cover," offering legal sanction by virtue of its historic authority in international law, human rights and combating racism, he added.

Cotler said he is not talking about criticism of Israel, which he does not believe to be anti-Semitic.

"The new anti-Semitism involves the discrimination against, denial of, or assault upon, the right of the Jewish People to live as an equal member of the family of nations – or to live at all – with Israel emerging as the targeted collective Jew among the nations," he said.

The conference was held from April 2 to 6 by Indiana University's Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism. About 70 scholars from different countries attended. The theme was "Anti-Zionism, Anti-Semitism and the Dynamics of Delegitimization."

"This attempt to portray Israel and the Jewish People as the enemy of all that's good and the repository of all that's evil, and to incriminate the UN and the universal public values in that process, is as pernicious as it is prejudicial," he said.

When he speaks of a lethal anti-Semitism, Cotler explained that it may also be called "genocidal anti-Semitism" because the Geneva Convention prohibits incitement to genocide, as well as the act itself.

He believes the Iranian regime's explicit calls for the annihilation of Israel fall into that category.

"This genocidal anti-Semitism can be seen, for instance, in the state-sanctioned incitement to genocide of [Ayatollah Ali] Khamenei's Iran, a characterization I use to distinguish it from the people and public of Iran, who are otherwise the targets of Khamenei's massive domestic repression," he said.

The charters of Hamas and Hezbollah also express a genocidal intent with their tenets to destroy Israel and kill Jews, Cotler added.

In singling out Israel for condemnation, the UN is granting impunity to the major human rights violators, such as Iran, Saudi Arabia, Russia and China, he said, and the integrity of the UN is diminished.

Similarly, designating a UN special rapporteur on human rights in the occupied Palestinian territories is wrong because this only looks at violations by Israel and not any other Middle Eastern country, he continued.

However, Cotler concluded, "as a Canadian, the UN is in my DNA," and he is not ready to give up on it.

"We should not retreat or abandon the UN because of its singling out of Israel," he said. "Rather, we should seek to reform and amend these breaches of the UN charter and launch a set of initiatives for this purpose." ■

Kay vs. Kay

Are left-wing Jews self-hating pariahs or merely misguided western intellectuals?

Barbara Kay: One of the most popular books in Israel right now is Catch the Jew! by gonzo journalist Tuvia Tenenbom. Tenenbom is a German-Israeli Jew who lives in New York. His advantage as a reporter is that his German – his mother tongue – is so perfect he can pass as ethnically German and often does (at such times he goes by "Tobias").

For seven months, Tenenbom rambled around Israel and the Palestinian Authority, talking to anyone and everyone, in search of objective truth. The book is very entertaining, even when uncovering the brazen and ferocious anti-Semitism of the innumerable NGO types from Europe, who think he is German and bare their Judeophobic souls.

One of the book's more sobering revelations is the depth of self-loathing Tenenbom found among Israeli intellectuals. They condemned Israel unreservedly, but the Palestinians could do no wrong. Tenenbom writes:

"It's a mental problem… for 2,000 years the Jews have been persecuted, for 2,000 years they have been taught they are the worst… Some people cannot handle it… and they say: 'If everyone in the world says I'm bad, that I am ugly, a thief, a murderer, horrible shrewd person, a money grubber, I am. What can I do to cleanse myself of it' And what do they do? Catch another Jew doing wrong… that makes them feel better, makes their ugly skin feel better."

The internalization of the world's anti-Semitism has produced a collective monster in our midst. The "as-a-Jew-catch-a-Jew" syndrome has become performance theatre with enthusiastic audiences flocking to enjoy Jews behaving badly. Some call these Jews "Theobold Jews" (Theobold was a Jewish convert to Christianity who made up the first blood libel in the 12th century), and some call them "alter-juifs," those who have led anonymous, secular lives, but who suddenly decide they must "break the silence" and "as a Jew" denounce Israel for its sins.

The problem has also been called "the tyranny of penitence" and "masochistic omnipotence syndrome." But whatever it is called, it is a contemporary version of the "sinat achim" (fraternal hatred) that has always plagued Jewish life. Today, it is a hatred of a particularly virulent, organized and dangerous strain, allied with global Islamofascism and eager to play with a fire that is meant to consume Israel.

Walrus editor Jonathan Kay debates National Post columnist Barbara Kay.

Jonathan Kay: Insofar as Tenenbom's book title goes, Catch the Jew! sounds like a game-show idea made up by Borat. And I mean that as a compliment. I also like the idea of going around and seeing what people "really think" about this or that group. Hilarity is always bound to ensue.

But let's face it: when people think they're speaking to a sympathetic soul, they say stupid things about all sorts of folks. Or sometimes they just blurt out their negative generalizations in public. Mark Steyn on Muslims; Donald Trump on Mexicans; me on millennials – these are all examples that come readily to mind. As the late George Jonas aptly put it, we're all bigots at heart.

You're not going to have to convince me that anti-Semitism is, as Ruth Wisse memorably called it, "The 20th century's most successful ideology." And you're also not going to have to convince me that some left-wing Jews do join joyously in their own denunciation. Where you lose me is in word salad like "the tyranny of penitence" and "masochistic omnipotence syndrome." What we have here is the left-wing academic fashion for pretentious neologisms flipped on its head. We don't need fancy new phrases to describe what we have here, which is essentially just a Jewish variation on the well-established western penchant for civilizational guilt and self-flagellation.

This is a general phenomenon that Dinesh D'Souza wrote about lucidly before he got behind the camera and started producing whacked-out hit jobs on Barack Obama. In his book The End of Racism, he noted that western civilization is the only civilization known to mankind whose most refined minds regularly do nothing except excoriate the injustices and evils of their own society, while often sentimentally fetishizing the supposed wonders of more technologically primitive and socially regressive civilizations.

We've been doing this since – what? – the 1960s? Send a kid to a $50,000-a-year liberal arts college in New England these days, and the teenager who comes back to you at Christmas will be telling you all about how the patriarchal phallocracy is responsible for suppressing authentic aboriginal ways of feminist knowing. Or something. Having waded into these theories a little bit in law school, I can tell you that a lot of it is just socio-babble joined together by one very strong ideological filament, which is the idea that our society is corrupt, cruel and unjust. That's what kids learn today.

A protest and counter-protest in Toronto in 2014

Like you, I have been to Israel many times. In the cafés of Tel Aviv and on the country's university campuses, it is basically a western-style country — with a western-style intelligentsia. And as with any western-style intelligentsia, it is consumed by liberal self-loathing and guilt. I agree with you (and, presumably, Tenenbom) that this is an unfortunate spectacle. But how is it any more unfortunate than the Canadian intellectuals who proclaim Canada to be nothing more than a morally contaminated colonial enterprise built atop the mass graves of First Nations? Or the American intellectuals who still cite Chomsky chapter and verse in describing U.S. influence anywhere on the planet? How is Israel special here? How are Jews special?

Look at you. Get over yourself.

Barbara Kay: I am surprised that you cannot see the obvious differences between the self-loathing of Israeli intellectuals and the generalized self-loathing of western intellectuals.

Canada, for example, is not in the crosshairs of the United Nations night and day, nor are Canadian students in general running a gauntlet of hatred on their campuses. The most populous and triumphalist religion on Earth does not have hatred of Canadianism built into its sacred texts. There is no long-term hatred called "anti-Canadianism." There is no great mass of people whose common bond is a hysterical hatred of Canadians and who have declared their chief purpose in life to see all Canadians wiped from the Earth as the eradication of a cancer. Canadian youth do not brood over the massacre of half their numbers in the not-so-distant past. Need I go on?

It is immaterial to Canada – or Sweden, or France (or fill in western nation here) if a clutch of academics hate the West. It will roll on like a big, lazy river with pebbles being thrown into it from time to time. But it is quite material to Jews that – a tiny majority of the population – their own intellectuals happen to constitute a shameful disproportion of the anti-Zionist activism on campuses with large numbers of Jews.

That is confusing and demoralizing to Jews who want to feel – and legitimately should feel – proud of their heritage and proud of their attachment to their homeland.

Israel has all the appearances of a western-style country on the surface. And many Israelis live ordinary lives much like we do. But dig an inch down, and you cannot compare our experience of life. Israelis contrive to maintain normal lives, even though they know that every day, someone somewhere in Israel is being stabbed or blown up because he is Jewish. Canadians do not experience their lives that way.

So yes, some Jews do participate joyously in the general world pogrom against Jews. But the "some" Jews are probably equal in number to the "some" non-Jews on many campuses. Proportionately that is a crazy percentage of Jews against a minuscule number of non-Jews. You would not find this phenomenon of exterminationist denunciation of its spiritual centre among any other religious or ethnic groups. I say exterminationist in its real sense, not to be dramatic. If you support the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, you are supporting the demise of Israel as a Jewish homeland.

There are two groups of BDS Jews: the naive kind who think they are helping Israel become a just and moral country, and the hardcore, Hamas-embracing Israel-as-Nazis militants (Max Blumenthal is a good example) who know exactly what they want: Israel erased (catch that Jew!), and their own lives eased.

I'm not saying every Jew has to love being Jewish or love Israel. In the past, Jews with no interest or great love for Judaism dropped out of Judaism, called themselves atheists or secular or ex-Jews or "of Jewish provenance," but they went their own way. The Communist Jews wanted to dissolve their Judaism in the great utopian flow of internationalism. It didn't work out so well, but they at least did not go around bellowing "not in my name" when Orthodox Jews did their thing. In the past you could convert to Christianity or Islam and rid yourself of your Jewishness that way.

But Israel is just this gigantic elephant in the room. It won't go away, and it has influence over them, whether they want it to or not. So Jews who want to be secular, who want to be ex-Jews, find they can't, because the anti-Semites (who won't admit they're anti-Semites) keep judging them against Israel. And it's settled in progressive minds that Israel is apartheid, Nazi, the great oppressor occupier, the source of all evil. So they have to choose. They have to pick a side. And they choose progressivism because it's tough to beat against that current in university, and progressivism is now as synonymous with hatred for Israel as feminism is synonymous with "a woman's right to choose."

You can't be a progressive and a Zionist any more than you can be a feminist and pro-life. It has come to be understood that when a person finds herself unable to identify with Judaism or with Jewish peoplehood, then she must automatically become an anti-Zionist. This is a choice no other ethnic or religious group is forced to make.

A Jewish woman makes her views known at a Queen's Park rally in July 2014.

> Jonathan Kay

Jonathan Kay: Look, guilty left-wing western intellectuals are guilty left-wing intellectuals — whether they are Jewish or gentile. It's a fundamentally Marxist reflex, rooted in the idea that people who are poor and oppressed (Palestinians) have the moral upper hand over those who are rich and powerful (Israel). And these same intellectuals don't care a whit for your colourful denunciations of the Islamic threat. Just the opposite: they view terrorism and Islamic militancy as a form of blowback from generations of western colonialism and occupation and such.

We all know these arguments, and I will not recite them here. The point is that these left-wing, Israel-hating Jews you speak of are not suffering some sort of unique psychological pathology that requires an esoteric new label. It is, as I say, just the standard application of a Marxist oppressed-oppressor paradigm to the Jewish state. It's Naomi Klein redux. And it's not new. Or even particularly interesting.

But as I read this last response from you, it occurred to me that the tenor of what you write explains why so many younger Jews are turned off by dogmatic Zionism. I recognize all of the talking points you have listed here, as I once used them all in my own editorials at the National Post. And they are all true in some way.

An anti-Israel protest in Calgary in 2014

But it is dispiriting to see that much of the writing about Israel [illegible] in, say, Commentary magazine, or the columns of Charles Krauthammer, still largely consists of a mechanical repetition of this same catalogue of arguments, without much variation. In this way, the Zionist right has created a dogma that is just as tiresome (though not quite as other-worldly) as the anti-Zionist dogmas that exist among doctrinaire anti-Zionist liberals.

In these colour-by-number fusillades, the Arabs are always cast as unremittingly bellicose and anti-Semitic, the Israelis always patient and civilized. There is no hint of any real curiosity about the range of opinions that now exist among Palestinians, or Arabs more generally. Nor is there any admission of the increasingly shrill character of religious Zionism in Israel, nor the many completely gratuitous humiliations and inconveniences that Israel imposes on ordinary Palestinians. Where Iran is concerned, it's always Munich 1938. And Obama is always Chamberlain. Let's not pretend that left-wing Jews are the only blinkered dogmatists here.

I am on your side when it comes to those Jews who support BDS. But BDS types actually comprise a very tiny part of left-wing Jewry. Globally, the BDS movement has been a complete failure when it comes to hurting Israel's economy. But it has been a massive success in driving North American Zionists bug-eyed with unhinged hostility against this tiny fragment of extreme leftists who waste their time trying to set sail "boats for Gaza" and such.

A few months ago, I started participating in events organized by the New Israel Fund (NIF) here in Canada. And my old National Post friends warned me that NIF was a hive of strident Jewish anti-Zionists. But that turned out to be completely false. Not only do NIF types generally reject the BDS movement, they also entertain a wide range of opinions about Israel, good and bad. It was actually refreshing to be in a room full of people who actually seemed curious to learn more – even from people who didn't share their views.

All of which to say: if hardline North American Zionist Jews (such as yourself) wonder why some of their Jewish friends have become radically alienated from the Zionist project, they might want to examine the brittle, tribalizing sloganeering – not to mention casual denunciation of the entirety of Arab and Islamic civilization – that now has become a casually recited component of pro-Israel advocacy.

Barbara Kay: I reject your all-the-same lumping of Jews against Jews with the general anti-westernism of the intelligentsia, which is, as you say, grounded in the Marxist paradigm of oppressed-oppressor. A true parallel would be an organized movement consisting of Christians-against-Christians in league with ISIS. That never happens in any organized way with other religions.

Paroxysmal hatred of Israel by Jews expressed in an organized and proud alliance with those sworn to the extermination of Jews is an entirely new thing. It arose in 1967 when the left turned against Israel and demanded that Jews choose between progressivism and Zionism. Those who chose the left have been put through their paces to prove their allegiance. I consider their desperate ingratiation with Israel's enemies with the same mixture of revulsion and pity I reserve for adolescents who "cut" themselves. This is, I insist, a new phenomenon. There was no Nazi-Jewish alliance. There was no organized Jewish support to convict Dreyfus.

Your use of the words "dogmatic" and "hardline" to describe Zionists like me is off-putting and patronizing. I suppose that you would have called me a "hardline" capitalist in the 1950s because I felt communism was an existential threat to the democratic way of life. I was right then, and I believe I am right today. I think there are all kinds of things wrong with capitalism. But one had to take a side in that conflict, and I chose the side of freedom. One must take a side today and for the same reason: democracy against totalitarianism.

Hatred of Jews in the Middle East has nothing to do with settlements or checkpoints or "oppression." It is a question of honour and shame. Muslims are shamed by having Jews in their midst as a sovereign nation. Period. Nothing will satisfy them but a Judenrein Middle East. Anyone who has the effrontery to call himself a Jew and yet align himself with Hamas and Hezbollah has not come to that position through reason; he is culturally disordered.

I also take issue with your stereotyping me as a reader of Commentary and Charles Krauthammer and nobody else, implying that only you and your thoughtful friends at the New Israel Fund read everyone. If by "dogmatic" you mean that I prefer Israel to be in the right in conflicts, but will still stand by Israel as a homeland to take pride in even when she is not always right, then colour me dogmatist. I would prefer to describe myself as someone who has taken a side at a historical junction. You cannot be neutral any more than Switzerland was in World War II, when neutrality meant a refusal to choose between outright evil and imperfect good. I hope that is not your position.

The BDS movement does not really care if they have quantifiable success. They are playing the long game of relentless indoctrination, convincing the leaders of tomorrow that there is something inherently illegitimate about Israel's existence. It is working, and thanks in large part to the Naomi Kleins of our people. I despise them and so do their Palestinian friends in the BDS movement. They are to the Palestinians what the "Useful Idiots" of the intelligentsia were to the Communists (I call our Jewish version "Useful Jewdiots"). With the added feature that to militant Muslims, Jews who turn on their brothers are people without honour. It's the one point in this discussion on which Hamas and I would agree.

Jonathan Kay: I love how you refuse the labels "dogmatic" and "hardline," and then in the same breath compare Palestinians to Nazis and suggest BDS types are akin to mentally ill adolescents who slice themselves with knives. I really couldn't have made the point any better myself.

Hardline Zionists are so used to talking to one another in echo chambers that they no longer consider how off-putting their slogans are for people expecting fair-minded debate. Re-read what you've written here. Do you think this sort of language makes your side attractive to open-minded liberal Jews? Or do you think it confirms the caricatures of op-ed-page Zionists they heard from their friends over orange slices at the Bard College Feminist Seder?

One more thing. You say you "despise" the Jews who disagree with you on this, and suggest they are also despised pariahs among all the world's peoples – completely medieval imagery. Aside from being a Jew, you are also an intellectual. And it is an intellectual's mandate not to "despise" anyone. Not bigots, not hatemongers, not conspiracy theorists. They all have things to teach us, even if it is not the lesson they intend, and even if we find their views self-evidently wrong and even dangerous. You blind yourself to learning if you are full of hate. You become an activist instead of an intellectual – an especially dangerous position for an intellectual who is also a journalist.

Last week, on the National Public Radio podcast Hidden Brain, the host profiled two amazing people: a Palestinian academic who brought his West Bank students to Auschwitz so they could understand the Holocaust, and a religious Jewish soldier who became alienated from the IDF after witnessing the inhumane treatment of an elderly Palestinian woman in her own home. That soldier now articulates views very much in harmony with the left-wing types you dismiss as self-cutting pariahs. Do you "despise" him? Because, frankly, I'd be more interested in talking to these two men than the whole parade of party-line Netanyahu boosters who tend to dominate the speaking roster at many North American big-budget public affairs events.

I will end this exchange on a personal note, since all of my intellectual learning began with the bookshelf in our family home. On that bookshelf, I found both the Jewish tradition of Talmud and scholarly debate, but also the plain-spoken literary tradition of the modern West – my favourite specimen, of course, being George Orwell. Both influences teach us that you learn through observation and humility. Simply telling your debating opponents that they are pathological nutcases who deserve the world's hatred may allow one to feel like a successful Zionist. But it marks failure for an intellectual – and perhaps also for a Jew. ■

No Jewish history on Temple Mount, UNESCO says

NOGA TARNOPOLSKY
PARIS

UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Association, announced a number of resolutions just before the start of last weekend.

One, submitted by Russia, called for defining UNESCO's role in safeguarding and preserving Palmyra and other Syrian World Heritage sites. Another was about "Enhancing UNESCO's contributions to promote a culture of mutual respect and tolerance."

A third was simply entitled "Occupied Palestine" and addressed the Jerusalem Old City hot spot that Jews refer to as the Temple Mount and Muslims call Haram Al-Sharif, the Noble Sanctuary. Except that the Jewish link to the site, considered the holiest place for Jews, went unmentioned.

In the context of Jerusalem's Old City, the document refers to Israel solely as "the occupying power" and refers to the site itself, the world famous esplanade flanked by the Western Wall – considered by many experts to be the last existing retaining wall of the mount that once held the ancient Jewish temples – only by its Islamic moniker. The decision refers to the plaza fronting the Western Wall only in quotation marks, except when using one of its Arabic names, Al-Buraq, a reference to the prophet Muhammad's ascent to heaven.

The Israeli government responded with fury.

"This is yet another absurd UN decision," an incandescent Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement released late on April 16. "UNESCO ignores the unique historic connection of Judaism to the Temple Mount, where the two temples stood for a thousand years and to which every Jew in the world has prayed for thousands of years. The UN is rewriting a basic part of human history and has again proven that there is no low to which it will not stoop."

Carmel Shama Hacohen, Israel's representative to UNESCO, issued a press release declaring that "even if UNESCO passes dozens of resolutions, and decides to continue passing thousands more, Jerusalem will always remain as part of the capital of Israel and the Jewish people."

Last Saturday night, addressing Jordan, Algeria, Egypt, Lebanon, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, and Sudan, the nations which presented the resolution, Shama Hacohen averred that, "As you continue on this path of incitement, lies and terror you will be sending UNESCO down a path towards irrelevance."

The Jordan Times revelled: "Jordan triumphant in 'diplomatic showdown' over Jerusalem at UNESCO."

Jews are permitted to visit the site at pre-arranged times, but under international agreements signed when Israel captured the area from Jordan in the 1967 war, Jewish worship is banned.

Without citing specifics, the resolution also condemned Israel for "planting fake Jewish graves in other spaces of the Muslim cemeteries" and for "the continued conversion of many Islamic and Byzantine remains into the so-called Jewish ritual baths or into Jewish prayer places."

Among the states supporting the decision were Argentina, France, Spain, Slovenia, Sweden, India and Russia, several of which enjoy ostensibly warm relations Israel.

A UNESCO spokesman declined to comment on the decision.

The Israeli government also declined to comment beyond the statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office.

The resolution, considered a victory for anti-Israel hardliners, also affirms that Hebron, a city that according to most histories has a 3,000-year history of Jewish life, and Bethlehem, the birthplace of Jesus, are "an integral part of Palestine."

Referencing "ongoing Israeli illegal excavations, works, construction of private roads for settlers and a separation wall inside the Old City of Al-Khalil/Hebron, that harmfully affect the integrity of the site, and the subsequent denial of freedom of movement and freedom of access to places of worship," UNESCO also urged "Israel, the occupying power, to end these violations in compliance with provisions of relevant UNESCO conventions, resolutions and decisions."

This resolution is not the first attempt to designate anew holy sites in what may be the most contested spot in the Middle East.

In October, 2015, facing the rejection of Russia, China and even Cuba, that usually joins anti-Israel initiatives, the Palestinian delegation to UNESCO withdrew a proposed resolution that would have defined the Western Wall itself as an "integral part" of the compound holy to Muslims.

Anwar Ben Badis, a professor of Arabic and Aramaic at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and at Al-Quds University, who often leads tours of the esplanade, said the decision was "unequivocally political, not legal or binding in any way, but at attempt to support and further the Palestinian struggle."

Speaking with The Media Line, Ben Badis said he believes "that every decision provides international support to everything the Palestinians are doing to free Al-Aqsa and all of Palestine." ■

Police chief renews ban on Israeli lawmakers visiting Jerusalem flashpoint

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's Police Commissioner Roni Alsheich announced a renewed open-ended ban on Israeli lawmakers visiting the flashpoint Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

The directive was issued in a letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on April 17, in which Alsheich wrote: "In light of attempts by many extremist elements from both sides to create provocations... I surmise that at this time, ascent to the Temple Mount by Knesset members is likely to result in an exacerbation of tensions and an escalation of incidents that would cause a real endangerment of the security of the state.

"I have decided to continue the ban on members of Knesset going up to the Temple Mount until further notice. The issue will be considered anew once the [holiday season is] over," Alsheich added in the letter, according to a Channel 2 report.

Netanyahu warned last week that "extremist elements" were attempting to sow unrest in Jerusalem and other areas in efforts to renew violence between Israelis and Palestinians ahead of the Passover holiday, which starts this weekend.

The prime minister said security forces would increase their readiness to counter those attempts amid a wave of Palestinian attacks that began more than six months ago and has lately been ebbing.

"There are, at present, attempts to rekindle the unrest and the violence, especially over Passover and the Temple Mount, as we previously experienced during the holidays last autumn," Netanyahu said during a speech in Tel Aviv to the union of local authorities.

OPINION

There's more to do to reach the Promised Land

Yair Lootsteen

There's no tale of collective Jewish history, of Jewish peoplehood, more telling than the story of the Exodus from Egypt, a story most Jews will recount at their Passover seders in just a few days.

This year, as I prepared for that lovely long evening of family, food, discussions and learning, I came across a speech David Ben-Gurion gave at the Peel Commission in 1937, a commission tasked with exploring a possible partition of Mandatory Palestine between Jews and Arabs. During that speech, he said the following:

"Three hundred years ago, there came to the New World a boat, and its name was the Mayflower. The Mayflower's landing on Plymouth Rock was one of the great historical events in the history of England and in the history of America. But I would like to ask any Englishman sitting here on the commission, what day did the Mayflower leave port? What date was it? I'd like to ask the Americans: do they know the date the Mayflower left port in England? How many people were on that boat? Who were their leaders? What kind of food did they eat on the boat?

"More than 3,300 years ago, long before the Mayflower, our people left Egypt, and every Jew in the world, wherever he is, knows what day they left. And he knows what food they ate. And we still eat that food every anniversary. And we know who our leader was. And we sit down and tell the story to our children and grandchildren in order to guarantee that it will never be forgotten."

As I read of "every Jew in the world, wherever he is," I couldn't help thinking of the miraculous modern-day exodus that has brought millions of Jews to Israel from around the globe.

Israel today has the largest Jewish population of any country on earth. Nearly 43 per cent of all Jews live here, compared to 40 per cent living in the United States and 2.7 per cent in Canada, whose 385,000 Jews comprise the world's fourth-largest community.

But preparing to sit down to retell the story of the Exodus, I worry about the continued link between Israel and the world's Jews, especially those progressive Jews – Reconstructionist, Reform, Conservative, Renewal – who constitute a significant segment of the present Diaspora, but whose Judaism continues to be treated as second- and third-rate by the Jewish state, the only western democracy where not all Jews are equal.

As an Israeli Reform Jew (and deputy chair of the Israel Movement for Reform and Progressive Judaism), I'm proud of our ever-growing movement – tens of vibrant congregations led by strong lay leaders and Israeli-trained Reform rabbis, educational programs, a youth movement, social justice arm and much more – all testimony to the growing numbers of Israelis who understand there's more than one way to be Jewish.

This winter has been a veritable roller-coaster.

After several years of negotiations, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government made a historic decision to develop a section of the Western Wall for egalitarian prayer, allowing progressive Jewish movements to be partners in administering that segment of the Wall.

Furthermore, our Supreme Court, the unrelenting beacon of Israel's democracy, issued two important rulings. One stipulated that public mikvahs – ritual bathhouses – must be opened to Reform and Conservative converts. The other said the state must recognize Orthodox conversions even if they weren't performed by the official rabbinate.

Weeks after those landmark decisions, Netanyahu got cold feet. Fearing his narrow coalition would collapse, he bowed to haredi pressure, opening the Western Wall agreement for re-examination. Meanwhile, his haredi cohorts are initiating legislation meant to circumvent the Supreme Court's rulings.

At the seder, we'll recite that in every generation, each person must regard him/herself as if he/she had come out of Egypt. While we have miraculously arrived in the Land of Israel, there's much more to be done before we reach the Promised Land. ■

Police, Netanyahu plead for calm on Temple Mount

Israel Police Commissioner Roni Alsheich

"On the eve of the Passover holiday, all kinds of extremist elements are promoting lies about our policies on the Temple Mount with the aim of causing riots and fueling tensions. We are working against these inciters and against these inciting elements, and we will increase our forces in places of friction and also take defensive measures. We are also sending messages to Jordan, the Palestinian Authority and the entire Arab world," he said.

"I invite you too, mayors, Jews and Arabs alike, to work with the residents of your towns and cities to calm tensions. We will not allow a radical minority to change the course of things," he added.

Netanyahu also reiterated Israel's commitment to the status quo on the Temple Mount, which today houses Islam's Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock shrine and is known in Arabic as Haram al-Sharif, or the Holy Sanctuary.

"I tell you with full certainty: there has not been, nor will there be, any change in our policy toward the status of the Temple Mount-Haram al-Sharif. Do not believe the lies that are promoted, unfortunately, by a number of Knesset members," Netanyahu said. "We are committed to maintaining peace and security and we will do whatever is necessary to ensure the security of Israeli citizens."

Muslims regard the Temple Mount as the third-holiest site in Islam, after Mecca and Medina. In Judaism, the Temple Mount, the location of both ancient Jewish temples, is so holy that Jews have traditionally refrained from setting foot there due to ritual purity rules. They congregate instead at the adjacent Western Wall, a retaining wall of the ancient temple complex that is now considered the most revered site for Jewish prayer.

Under an agreement between the Israeli government and Islamic authorities at the site reached after Israel's conquest of the Old City of Jerusalem in the 1967 Six Day War, Jews are allowed to visit but not pray on the mount itself. Jewish visitors suspected of violating the Temple Mount prayer ban are routinely arrested by Israeli police.

During Passover, and other High Holy Days, some religiously observant Jews seek to visit the compound.

Clashes between Palestinian youths and Israeli security forces erupted at the compound in September 2015 amid fears among Muslims that Israel was planning to change the rules governing the site. Israel has repeatedly denied any such plans.

Netanyahu's comments came a day after Israeli President Reuven Rivlin called a meeting with the leaders of Israel's faith communities to work toward reducing tensions surrounding the Temple Mount, and to promote a message of tolerance ahead of Passover, Orthodox Easter and other holidays.
